SHEER SPECTACLE Anubis and Bast (both wearing Bottega Veneta) attempt a free climb as Who watches from a safe spot below.

OUR SEPTEMBER MEN'S STYLE issue kicks off the fall with an attitude shared by our fashion coverage and the leading men profiled within: fearlessness.

Oscar-winning actor Jared Leto is legendary for the lengths he'll go to in order to inhabit a role. For his upcoming performance in Blade Runner 2049, in which he portrays a blind character, Niander Wallace, Leto wore contact lenses that blocked his sight for the entire time he was on set. As our feature reveals, Leto's talents extend beyond the big screen: as a musician (in his band Thirty Seconds to Mars), a savvy tech investor (he's backed Uber, Slack and Spotify) and a rock climber. But even when he ventures close to the edge, he's conscious of his limits. "I'm crazy," he says. "But I'm not insane."

When Rag & Bone co-founder Marcus Wainwright was just starting out, knowing next to nothing about making apparel was no deterrent to his ambition to produce a new type of American denim. Thanks to his prescience about handmade fashion, today he's the CEO of a business that operates 27 retail outposts around the world (with a new store opening in Miami this fall) and counts among its creative collaborators Thom Yorke, Glen Luchford and John Turturro. Though both of his partners have left the company, Wainwright says in some ways it's a positive change: "I now only have myself to blame if it goes wrong."

Contributing editor Sarah Medford takes a tour of Palais de la Zahia, the sumptuous Moroccan home of French intellectual and iconoclast Bernard-Henri Lévy and his wife, model and actress Arielle Dombasle. Lévy, known for his prodigious output and willingness to express controversial opinions, purchased the house from its previous owner, Alain Delon, in 1998. Since then, he and Dombasle have restored and expanded the historic riad where Yves Saint Laurent, Gore Vidal and the Beatles and Rolling Stones once partied. Lévy admits the place is a little haunted, but he's not afraid. They're "good ghosts," he says.

HANGING OUT WITH JARED LETO P. 102

It was a scorching day in California's Malibu Creek State Park when Jared Leto posed for this issue's cover, but that didn't keep the multidimensional actor, singer and tech investor from wearing a Gucci coat. "For Jared, the wilder the clothes, the better," says stylist George Cortina. "His style is always evolving. He doesn't want to be conventional." Photographer Terry Richardson first met Leto on an editorial shoot focused on the physical transformation Leto made to play John Lennon's killer, Mark David Chapman, in the 2007 film Chapter 27. They have been close ever since. "We've worked together many times," says Richardson, "but a lot of our best images are from when we're just hanging out, and I shoot snapshots." Writer Josh Eells met up with Leto at the actor's expansive L.A. home, which Eells compares to a museum. "Jared was gliding around his house with this minimalist grace," Eells recalls. "He radiated an aura of total peace and tranquillity." —Sara Morosi

THE COLUMNISTS

WSJ. asks six luminaries to weigh in on a single topic. This month: Status quo.

MESSUD

"I grew up with all these contradictory messages when it came to the status quo and how it related to the lives of girls and women. My mother was an active feminist in her reading and the things she said to us, and yet in her daily life she was a traditional wife—she married in the '50s and was still living in the '50s in the '90s. I adored my dad, but I don't believe he ever boiled an egg. So that question—what is the status quo?—was always fairly complicated. Certainly, they were specific concerns in my novel The Woman Upstairs, in terms of Nora's desire to be an artist and the ways in which all those contradictions play out in her life. But I would say an interest in the messy reality of those contradictions is something that I've internalized. That's been part of my experience my whole life, not only with my family, but in watching other people's lives."

CARTER

"Status quo can certainly have a pejorative connotation. Before opening Estela, my business partner Ignacio [Mattos] and I each spent time at places that upended the status quo in terms of fine dining. For instance, I used to work at Blue Hill. Dan Barber, the chef there, really changes people's perception of dining—how they're eating, where they're sourcing their ingredients. So when Ignacio and I opened Estela, our thought was that there weren't too many restaurants in New York where you could get that quality of wine program, service and food without the price tag. (Although Estela isn't cheap!) Nowadays, it's expected that we all work ourselves to the bone, so we try to strip away all the extra things that cloud the experience and try to get to the pure experience, to allow a diner to connect with whomever they're dining alongside."

CLEMENTINE

"It's important for all of us to tap into things that make us uncomfortable. It's good to challenge yourself as an artist, because that opens portals to new discoveries. I'm always looking for ways to tap into my vulnerability, to provoke something I never knew before. The people I adore, from Tom Waits to Prince to Virginia Woolf, they changed things. Look at David Bowie. Look at Jimi Hendrix. They experimented. I can never be like them; I can only hope that one day I will have my own sort of space. It's not that I want people to think I'm different for superficial reasons. It's merely about expressing things your own way. And if you do what you want to do and it's similar to someone else, that's fine, too. But it's quite fulfilling to be able to do things your way. I suppose that's what being an artist is really all about."

JEANNE
GANG

"The very nature of architecture concerns change. Design requires a strategic plan of action for the future; it's progressive by definition. For a certain generation of architects, change only pertains to buildings' 'style.' This is a very status quo approach, which can limit architecture's potential in multiple ways. To me, climate change and other major challenges we face today require innovative design and delivery methods. This entails expanding the definition of what architecture is and the range of people who practice it. Architects can act as agents of change in order to build sustainably and meet the varied needs and aspirations of society, but we must develop new modes of thinking. Supporting a more diverse generation of practitioners to address these challenges will pave the way for innovation, but strangely there's still resistance to this within our profession. For a field that's about change, it's self-defeating."

LITHGOW

"To me the status quo is, as the Latin says, the present moment, the way things are now. But I guess the larger meaning of it is somewhat like the word zeitgeist—what is the prevailing mood? The movie industry is odd, because on the one hand it has to reinforce people's prejudices so as to appeal to what they want to see—it resorts to clichés in a sense—but on the other hand it's an industry that can change people's minds. Take movies like Moonlight, for example, or Easy Rider. They're little films that turn into big revolutionary statements. In Beatriz at Dinner, I play a billionaire real estate developer, an archetype for our times. It's a movie about a dinner party where all the standard procedures are disrupted. It becomes a really interesting metaphor because, boy, are we at a moment when standards are being disrupted. What's going to happen when we don't have any structures to fall back on?"

FISHMAN

"Status quo is something that you think exists, but it's just a framework for how we live, the formation that helps us 'understand' the world, when in fact we understand nothing of it. I was involved in a radical part of the feminist movement that caused me to examine everything I did. The whole tradition of art history I was deeply immersed in was male. I was also one of the few women who worked among a group of young male artists. So I initially rejected as much as I could, including the male understanding about art history. I cut up my grid paintings and stitched them together, trying to absorb a tradition that I'd never identified with, which was a woman's tradition of quilting and sewing. I mean, I hated that stuff, but I knew I was going to have to sink myself into it in order to understand the richness there. The movement really gave me permission to be exactly who I was."

Messud is an author. Her novel The Burning Girl was released last month.

Carter is co-owner of Estela, Café Altro Paradiso and Flora Bar in Manhattan.

Clementine is a singer-songwriter. His new album, I Tell a Fly, is out next month.

Gang is an architect.

Lithgow is an actor.

Fishman is an artist. Her solo exhibition at Cheim & Read opens this month, as does a retrospective at Weatherspoon Art Museum.

SCREEN TIME

MAKING WAVES

Artist Alex Israel's directorial debut is an art film in the form of a classic teen surfer flick with the goal of showing high schoolers the possibilities of creativity.

BY NED ZEMAN PHOTOGRAPHY BY MAX FARAGO

THE PAINTINGS AND SCULPTURES of 34-year-old artist Alex Israel tend to be big, sun-splashed affairs that reflect and refract the sparkly Hollywood demimonde he's long inhabited. A rapidly rising star, Israel is best known for his self-portraits, done in profile, that reveal a cool-breeze hipster with stubble and sunglasses. In some iterations, he fills in his empty silhouette with Hollywood iconography: directors' chairs, palm trees, beach scenes. Israel's work sells in the high six figures or more—his Sky Backdrop went for just over $1 million at Christie's in 2014, well above the top estimate of $300,000—and he hangs out with a high-profile crowd, among them the writer Bret Easton Ellis, with whom he collaborated on a two-person exhibition at Gagosian Gallery in Beverly Hills, and China Chow, whose father owns the Mr. Chow restaurant empire. He even works out of a studio on the Warner Brothers lot in Burbank.

In person, though, Israel is far more self-effacing and subdued than his art and reputation might suggest. And his latest project, he claims, is devoid of any irony. "It's really sincere," the artist says of SPF-18, his first film, done in the vein of Beverly Hills 90210, Baywatch and John Hughes movies. "I think a lot of the entertainment being made for kids right now is really kind of cynical and ironic. I wanted to make this more like what I remember from my childhood."

SPF-18 isn't meant to just entertain teenagers; it's meant to rally them. "The movie was built on the idea that creativity can help you find your voice," Israel says. Set in and around Malibu's iconic 1957 Wave House, the film is a coming-of-age story about four sun-kissed L.A. teenagers who ride tall, fall in love and look fantastic in Israel's custom-designed wet suits. "Each of the characters follows a creative path, which helps them evolve and make the transition from youth into adulthood," Israel explains.

Although the stars are basically unknowns, the film has a significant boldface quotient, thanks to a supporting cast that includes '80s-era icons Molly Ringwald, Rosanna Arquette and Pamela Anderson—not to mention a cameo by Keanu Reeves, star of the 1991 surf-gangster classic Point Break. Additionally, one of the film's newbie leads, 23-year-old Carson Meyer, is Hollywood royalty. (Her father, Ron Meyer, has run both the Creative Artists Agency and Universal Pictures.) Meyer was cast after Arquette told Israel, "I have the perfect quintessential Malibu girl for you."

"THE MOVIE WAS BUILT ON THE IDEA THAT CREATIVITY CAN HELP YOU FIND YOUR VOICE."

—ALEX ISRAEL

Among the film's producers are Kirsten "Kiwi" Smith, whose credits include the screenplay for Legally Blonde, and Chow, who connected Israel with Ringwald and Reeves as well as with Duran Duran. In exchange for doing the artwork on the band's 2015 album, Paper Gods, Israel got to use its 1982 hit "Hungry Like the Wolf" on his soundtrack. Friends also put him in touch with his screenwriter, Baywatch co-creator Michael Berk.

SPF-18 will debut on a screening tour that will take Israel to at least 12 high schools nationwide before the movie arrives on iTunes on September 29 and on Netflix a month later. "I read that early surf films were shown in high school gymnasiums," he explains, citing the grass-roots success of Endless Summer in the 1960s. "It seemed like an interesting way of distributing films—and a way to pay homage to surf movies."

"I liked the idea of bringing the film to schools," Ringwald says, "making art more inclusive for teenagers who don't get much exposure to the art world, other than the occasional museum field trip."

"The way he's putting it out there in high schools makes it another art adventure for Alex," Arquette adds. "It's a traveling art piece."

But it's also good business. The film will help plug the artist's new line of sunscreen, Icarus. The commercial aspect is something Israel easily acknowledges. "I was talking to one of my art dealers when I said, 'That's kind of off-brand.' And he was like, 'You just referred to your art as a brand.' I was like, 'Yes, I did.'"

And what exactly is that brand? "It's me," he says, and smiles.

PARTNERSHIP

FRESH LOOKS

Musician and producer Swizz Beatz is collaborating with Bally on the brand's new series of artist-designed capsule collections.

THE FIRST TIME they met in person, Frédéric de Narp, 48, the French-born CEO of the Swiss luxury brand Bally, and Swizz Beatz (né Kasseem Dean), 39, the Bronx-born rapper and record producer, talked for a full four hours. The meeting, at a rooftop party in New York last year, was the beginning of a close friendship between the pair. They have since brought that same intensity to their business relationship, the first fruits of which will be available in October with the Bally Collective capsule collection, curated by Swizz Beatz.

The connection came about in the most modern of ways, on social media. When his Instagram followers reacted positively to a post about his new Bally sneakers, Swizz Beatz contacted the brand, also via Instagram, to talk collaboration. Soon enough, he was deep in conversation with de Narp.

The first, 39-item release includes shoes, jackets, shirts and accessories, all featuring the colorful, iconographic work of Barcelona-based artist Ricardo Cavolo, whom Swizz Beatz met through the No Commission art fairs he curates for Bacardi. He plans to tap other No Commission artists for future Collective capsules.

For de Narp, working with Swizz Beatz recalls Bally's "moments of glory," specifically the 1920s, when modernist architect Robert Mallet-Stevens worked with Bally, and the 1980s, when hip-hop legends Doug E. Fresh and Slick Rick sported (and rapped about) the brand. Swizz Beatz describes the partnership as "organic, authentic, cutting-edge, forward-thinking." It's also just plain fun, says de Narp: "This is the craziest collection." bally.com. —Mark Yarm

BRAND REFRESH

EMPORIO ARMANI

In 1988, designer Giorgio Armani started a large-format glossy, Emporio Armani, featuring the work of many leading writers and photographers. A total of 18 issues were produced over the next nine years. Now, after a two-decade hiatus, the magazine is back. "I feel it's the right time to once again support image making, writing and ideas," Armani says. "I want to remind people how wonderful and inspiring imagery on paper can be." Available September 17 at certain Emporio Armani stores; armani.com. —Scott Christian

SWATCH OUT

As Savile Row clients venture beyond classic navy and gray, tailoring house Norton & Sons has started offering illustrations of its bespoke outfits in the new season's fabrics. Created by Ben Wolstenholme, the works give customers a clear picture of finished pieces in advance. nortonandsons.co.uk.

TIME FOR THAI

In his debut cookbook, Night + Market: Delicious Thai Food to Facilitate Drinking and Fun-Having Amongst Friends (out next month), chef Kris Yenbamroong offers over 100 recipes from his two L.A. restaurants (a third Night + Market outpost opens in Venice later this fall). For first-timers to Thai cooking, Yenbamroong recommends the fried rice dishes—"Good at 2 a.m. by yourself or for a dinner party." —Megan Conway

DESIGNER MARCO ZANINI CREATES A PARED-BACK CLOTHING COLLECTION FOR FOOTWEAR BRAND SANTONI

FOR ITS FIRST FORAY into ready-to-wear, Italian shoemaker Santoni tapped designer Marco Zanini to create a curated selection of clothing and footwear rather than a full-scale collection with a showy debut. "We decided to call it Santoni Edited by Marco Zanini because we realized that it was really about tightly editing staples," Zanini says. "The exercise for me was making classics without them looking boring or bourgeois." The seasonal capsule focuses on outerwear with subtle plays on proportion and color—for instance, a camel jacket flashes teal pocket linings while a lemon-yellow cashmere sweater is layered under a navy peacoat. Edited Milano, a lookbook shot by British duo Hill & Aubrey that also features photographs of Milan, accompanies the collection and includes an introduction that aptly begins "Less is better." ART TALK

DOUBLE FEATURE

This fall, two new spaces honoring the late fashion designer Yves Saint Laurent open in Paris and Marrakech.

DESIGNER Yves Saint Laurent lived in the moment, where fashion lives. So he likely wouldn't have cared much that not one but two museums devoted to him will open next month—one in the space where he worked in Paris, the other in Marrakech, which nourished him creatively and where he found peace in the sublime house and garden that he restored there.

But Saint Laurent's legacy mattered a great deal to Pierre Bergé, the man who shared his life and astutely managed his unmanageable lover's business fortunes until the designer's death in 2008. "From the moment he died—no, from the day he stopped working—I said, I want to transform memories into projects," says Bergé, 86, from his office at the Fondation Pierre Bergé-Yves Saint Laurent in Paris. "I think that's my role, and I've got to keep going as long as I can."

Over the course of 40 years, Saint Laurent created the smoking jackets, peacocks, sheer blouses and jumpsuits that helped reshape the way women dress. Today, around 5,000 YSL garments are stored on sliding racks in temperature-controlled archives at the Fondation's Paris headquarters, where they will be exhibited in the new museum space and available for research by fashion scholars.

The low-slung Marrakech museum, designed by French architects Karl Fournier and Olivier Marty of Studio KO, is a wider-ranging affair, mixing YSL exhibitions with a performance amphitheater and research collections on such YSL passions as botany and Berber culture.

"Fashion isn't art," says Bergé, who spent the past three years bringing the projects to fruition, "but I do believe it takes an artist to create it." Bergé's response to the museum openings: "Finally—what a relief." —Josh Levine

THE INSPIRATION

LIVING IN STYLE

An exclusive look at a new book on Renzo Mongiardino reveals rare images of the Italian designer's most iconic interiors.

IN THE 20TH CENTURY, to be on a first-name basis with "Renzo," as in Mongiardino, and lucky enough to work with the Milanese master of interior design meant entrée into an exclusive club. His client roster—once described as reading like "a kidnapper's wish list"—included such names as Agnelli, Brandolini, Rothschild, Niarchos, Thyssen-Bornemisza, Hearst, Heinz, Versace and Nureyev. The veneration of the Genoa-born designer has grown ever more fervent since his death in 1998 at the age of 81, thanks in part to a couple of monographs. Out next month is an insider's volume that feels personal and intimate: The Interiors and Architecture of Renzo Mongiardino: A Painterly Vision (Rizzoli), by Martina Mondadori Sartogo and the editors of Cabana magazine.

"Growing up in one of his houses and listening to him speak weekly at my mum's table is probably the strongest influence in the creation of Cabana," writes Mondadori Sartogo (the daughter of Italian publishing titan Leonardo Mondadori and industrial heiress Paola Zanussi), who founded the semianual publication in 2014. To tell the Mongiardino story, Mondadori Sartogo enlisted Mongiardino's granddaughter, art restorer Francesca Simone, to write a chapter on his relationship with Lila De Nobili, one of his closest collaborators.

Mondadori Sartogo also conducted in-depth interviews with two of the designer's closest living clients, Lee Radziwill and Elsa Peretti. "His taste was second to none, and his vision of architecture a rather simple one—that nothing could be invented but only reimagined from the past," Peretti, who worked with Mongiardino on two of her homes in Italy, recalls to Mondadori Sartogo. "He was my perfect holiday companion," she adds. "I really miss him."

The highlight of the new volume is the pictures. Mondadori Sartogo commissioned photographer Guido Taroni to shoot 19 Mongiardino projects (some published here for the first time) ranging from the early 1960s to the 1990s. All are still intact, with the trompe l'oeil finishes, layered fabrics and patterns and antiques for which Mongiardino is so revered. One drawback: Homeowners' names are withheld, so readers are left to their own devices to figure out if, say, that hôtel particulier in Paris might belong to Contessa Cristiana Brandolini d'Adda or that villa in Cetona might be the property of Valentino Garavani and his partner, Giancarlo Giammetti. "Renzo was the essence of a decorator," says Giammetti via phone from Italy. "He finished my house in 1987. I have never changed a thing. It's perfect." —James Reginato

WITH WSJ.

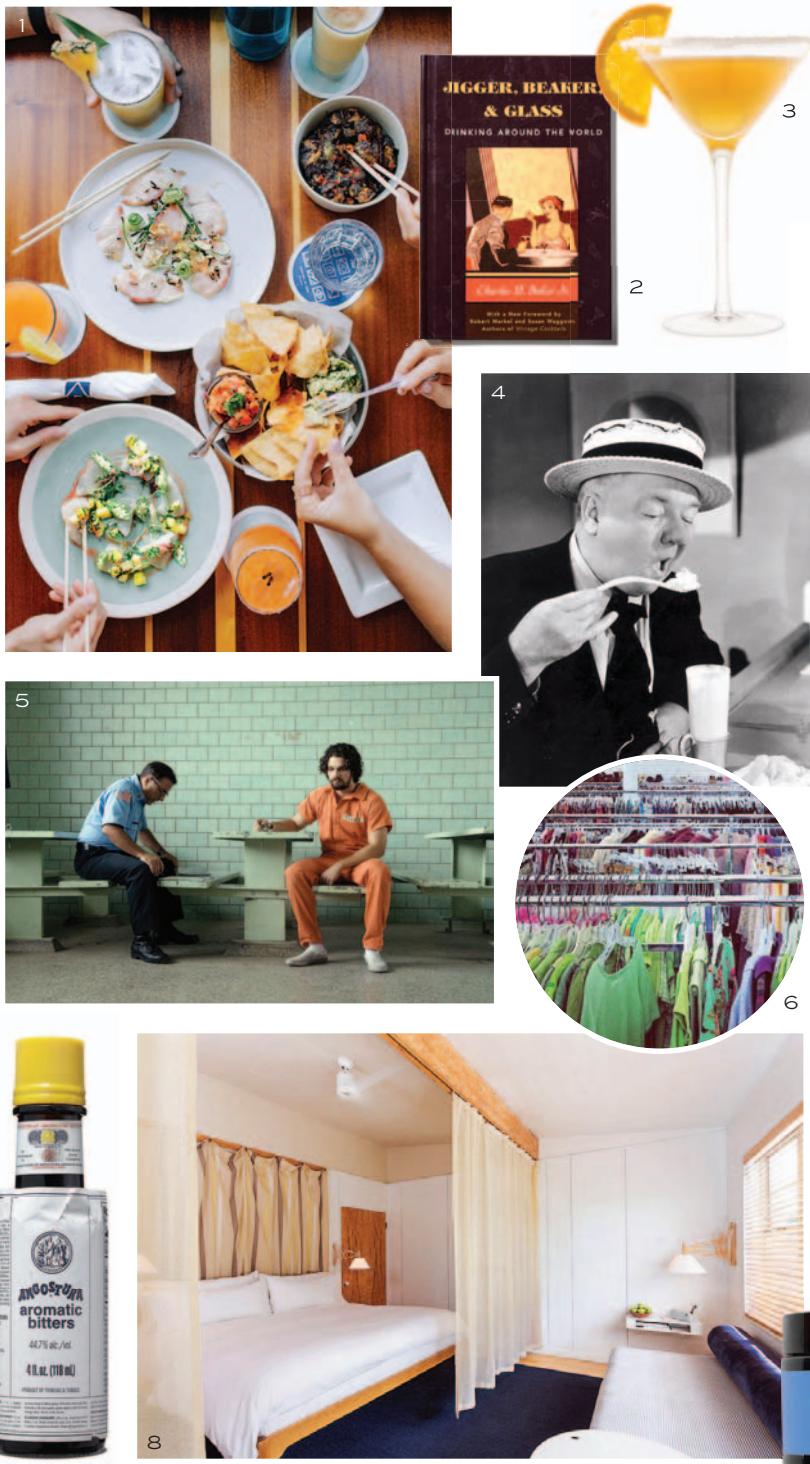

The rise of craft cocktails owes a lot to mavericks like Jim Meehan and Toby Maloney, and the movement's continued evolution to up-and-coming talents like Kelsey Ramage. Here, the three bartenders discuss their favorites, from drinks to books to hotels. —Ari Bendersky

TOBY MALONEY

This summer, Toby Maloney took a break from his busy career—he's beverage director for New York bars Mother's Ruin and the newly opened Loverboy as well as a partner and head mixologist at Nashville's Patterson House—and escaped to Martha's Vineyard, bringing his drink-making skills to a local beer-and-shot joint. It was an experience that recalled Maloney's first bartending gig at a Chicago Tex-Mex restaurant in the early 1990s. A few years later, he landed in New York where, over the next decade, he came up the ranks working at Pegu Club, Milk & Honey and Freeman's Alley. Eventually, he co-opened the Chicago cocktail lounge the Violet Hour, introducing high-quality drinks to a city focused on oversize martinis. Maloney, 49, still oversees the James Beard Award-winning bar, which turned 10 this year, and his former staff have gone on to open acclaimed spots around the country. "Seeing someone use the parts of your bar they loved and create something new is amazing," he says. >

1. What's your favorite place for drinks?
The Longboard on St. John.

2. What's your go-to cocktail book?
Charles H. Baker Jr.'s Jigger, Beaker, & Glass.

3. What's your classic cocktail of choice?
A sidecar works when it's freezing out or on a hot day.

4. What's a recent investment piece?
In the spirit of W.C. Fields, I've spent 90 percent of my money on booze, exotic travel and delicious food. The rest I've wasted.

5. What's your favorite film?
This changes, but I recently saw City Island and loved it.

6. What's the best place in the world to shop?
I love flea markets and thrift stores everywhere. The hunt is exhilarating.

7. What are your three travel essentials?
A big bottle of Angostura bitters, a rash guard and my Chrome dry bag.

8. What's a favorite hotel?
The Standard in Miami for its beautiful, unfussy rooms and pool deck.

9. What are your essential grooming products?
Razors from the Dollar Shave Club and Baxter of California lotion.

KELSEY RAMAGE

Kelsey Ramage, 32, didn't intend to get into bartending, but after picking up shifts at a Toronto nightclub to pay for college, the British Columbia native quickly took to it. After graduation she landed a desk job in the fashion industry but missed her long nights behind the bar. She went to Vancouver, where the craft-cocktail movement was heating up, and then, craving a change of scenery, she moved on to London, landing a job at the award-winning bar Dandelyan in the Mondrian hotel. After two years as senior bartender, Ramage left to focus on Trash Tiki, a series of pop-ups for which she and her partner, Iain Griffiths, turn food waste into world-class cocktails. Michelin-starred chef Dan Barber, of New York's Blue Hill restaurants, took notice and tapped them as beverage directors for Wasted, a dinner series earlier this year where the world's top chefs cooked with normally unwanted ingredients. This summer, Ramage and Griffiths took Trash Tiki on the road, spreading awareness of food waste across Europe, North and South America and Australia.

- 1. What music do you listen to at work?
Punk, as loud as possible.
 - 2. What's the best city in the world to shop?
Seoul is amazing. People have wicked style.
 - 3. Who's your favorite author?
I read a lot of Irvine Welsh. Glue was my favorite.
 - 4. What is your essential grooming product?
Manic Panic blue hair-dye; I carry it with me always.
 - 5. What's your top travel destination?
So far Madrid surprised me the most. The architecture was beautiful, the nightlife was a lot of fun, and the food was incredible—and there was loads of sherry, obviously.
 - 6. What's a favorite hotel?
I recently stayed at the Four Seasons Seoul, and it was exceptional.
 - 7. What cocktail recipe are you most proud of?
The whole notion behind Trash Tiki is using items that would be thrown out—citrus husks, bruised fruits, pulp left over from juicing—to make playful updates on classic tiki drinks.
 - 8. What's your current TV obsession?
Glow, on Netflix. It's right up my alley: some '80s, some punk, the B-horror subplot.
 - 9. What tool is essential to your job?
All we really need is a bucket, a strainer [shown] and a scale.
 - 10. What's the most unusual thing you've acquired while traveling?
Snake wine, a vermouth-type liquor used in Chinese herbal medicine that actually has a snake in the bottle.
 - 11. Where do you go for a getaway?
Oaxaca. Such a relaxed little city, with great food and lovely people.

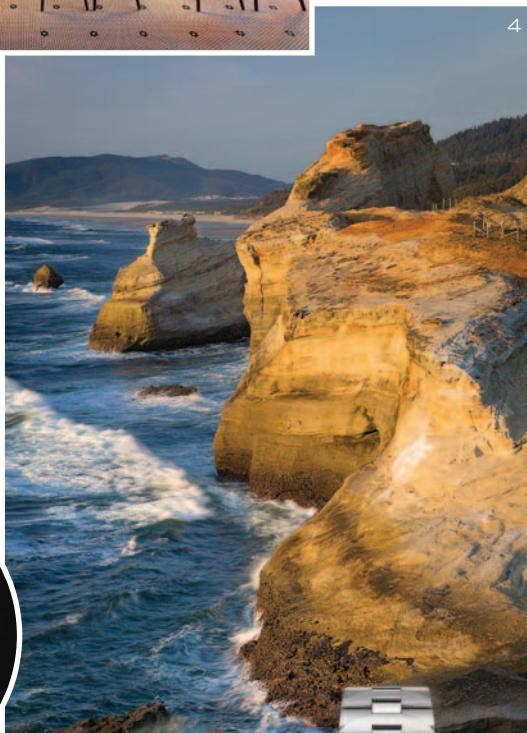

1. Which current bartenders do you admire?
It's deeply gratifying to follow the careers of bartenders I previously hired: Anne Robinson at Westlight, John deBary at Momofuku, Karen Fu at Donna, Jane Danger at Mother of Pearl, Sean Hoard at Kindred, Michael Madrusan at The Everleigh [shown] and Kevin Diedrich at P.C.H. are just a few.

2. What's your go-to cocktail book?
David Wondrich's Imbibe was definitely the most useful reference for my new book, Meehan's Bartender Manual [shown].

3. Who in the history of cocktails do you admire?
I try to focus on living legends like Dale DeGroff.

4. Where do you go for a getaway?

The Oregon coast, one of the most beautiful places on earth.

5. What cocktail recipe are you most proud of?
The Mezcal Mule at PDT.

6. What's your signature accessory?

A watch. I wore calculator watches, Swatch and Swiss Army watches when I was a kid, then grew into Tag Heuers, then my first mechanical watches: an IWC Flieger Chronograph, a Panerai Luminor [shown] and a Rolex Submariner.

7. What museum do you most like to visit?

The National Portrait Gallery in Washington, D.C.

8. Who's your favorite artist?

Wisconsin artist Walter Hamady. His hand-bound books, boxes and lantern slides are my most prized possessions.

9. Where was your most memorable meal?
Fäviken, in Sweden.

10. What music do you listen to?

Lately I've had Radiohead [shown], Kendrick Lamar, Dead Meadow, Bon Iver and Jay Z on heavy rotation.

JIM MEEHAN

Jim Meehan has come a long way from his student days, when he worked as a barback at State Street Brats in Madison, Wisconsin. But one thing that hasn't changed is his love of making drinks. After college, he moved to New York and took a job waiting tables. One night he went to the speakeasy Milk & Honey and had a revelation. "This was not the bartending I'd been doing, and I wanted to know everything about it." Meehan pored over vintage cocktail books and polished his skills working at places like Pegu Club and Gramercy Tavern. In 2007, he opened his East Village bar PDT, which went on to win the first-ever James Beard Award for outstanding bar program, in 2012. Meehan, 40, is still a partner at PDT, but for the past three years he and his family have lived in Portland, Oregon, where he runs a consulting firm, Mixography. This fall, in addition to co-opening Prairie School, a cocktail lounge in his hometown of Chicago, Meehan will release Meehan's Bartender Manual (Ten Speed Press), an essential guide to his profession. ●

TRACKED

BENJAMIN MILLEPIED

The renowned dancer and choreographer is moving in new directions.

BY THESSALY LA FORCE
PHOTOGRAPHY BY IKE EDEANI

BENJAMIN MILLEPIED possesses the healthy tan of a resident Angeleno. “I think New York has become incredibly conservative and too expensive. It’s L.A.’s moment now,” says the 40-year-old dancer and choreographer while on tour with his company, L.A. Dance Project, at New York’s Joyce Theater. Like so many artists these days, he and his wife, the Academy Award-winning actress Natalie Portman, have decided that L.A. is the place to be, officially making the move out west last year.

Four years ago, Millepied’s career was on a very different track. At age 36, he was named director at the Paris Opera Ballet, a much-publicized appointment that brought the French-born, American-trained dancer global attention. Then, after just two seasons, Millepied stepped down, causing another stir. He’s admitted that the changes he wanted to make—more diversity, less hierarchy—encountered too much resistance from the world’s oldest ballet company. But he also wanted to focus on his fledgling contemporary dance company, which he founded in 2012 with composer Nico Muhly and other talented friends, before the Paris Opera Ballet offer materialized.

This fall, his efforts will be rewarded when L.A. Dance debuts its new performance space in a former industrial building in downtown L.A. Millepied, who has worked with artists like Barbara Kruger and Christopher Wool, hopes to stage 40 performances a year—collaborating with choreographers such as Kyle Abraham—as well as offer workshops and classes. “It’s exciting to build a new audience here,” he says, acknowledging that he’s part of a new creative energy in a city normally devoted to movies and their stars.

Still, it seems that living in Tinseltown has had an effect on Millepied’s career. In May, he announced he would be adapting the opera Carmen into a feature-length film, for which Academy Award-nominated Moonlight composer Nicholas Britell is creating an entirely new score. Millepied’s research for the project involves watching the great directors, from Akira Kurosawa to Elia Kazan. “I like the process of being able to choose the light, frame the shot—all of these things,” he says. “I’m learning a lot, but it feels natural.” >

FASANO

São Paulo's Fasano family has been the top name in Brazilian hospitality for over a century. With Rogério Fasano leading the way, it's now expanding rapidly—and about to go global.

BY HOWIE KAHN PHOTOGRAPHY BY FRAN PARENTE

IN 1982, WHEN ROGÉRIO Fasano was 19, the first thing he did to revive his family's 80-year-old hospitality business and start rebuilding its legacy was to buy back its name. As Rogério tells it, over grilled langoustines and fresh-made ravioli in Fasano Al Mare, the restaurant in his Rio de Janeiro hotel opposite Ipanema Beach, the word Fasano signified sophisticated dining in São Paulo during stretches of the early and mid-20th century. But by the time Rogério was 1, he says, “the name was gone.”

Now 55, Rogério has cemented the Fasano name as the benchmark for upscale lodging and dining in Brazil. He has 15 restaurants and two bars, including the storied Restaurante Fasano in his namesake hotel in São Paulo. In addition to Fasano São Paulo and Fasano Rio de Janeiro, with its iconic rooftop pool, there are also two resorts—Fasano Boa Vista, 90 minutes outside of São Paulo, and Fasano Punta del Este in Uruguay. He is currently building five new hotels, including four more in Brazil (Angra dos Reis opens in December, followed by Trancoso, Belo Horizonte and Salvador in 2018), plus his first American endeavor in Miami. However, he never refers to himself as a hotelier. “I’m a restaurateur, like those before me,” he says.

In 1902, Rogério's Milan-born great-grandfather, Vittorio, opened Brasserie Paulista, the first Fasano family restaurant in São Paulo, serving Brazilian cuisine. When he died in the early 1920s, the restaurant was shuttered and his youngest son, Ruggero, relocated to Italy for boarding school. After graduating, Ruggero moved to Milan, where he met his wife, Ida (she worked as a salesperson in the original Prada store in Milan's Galleria Vittorio Emanuele II). They had two children, including Rogério's father, Fabrizio, and moved back to São Paulo in 1937.

There, Ruggero resumed Vittorio's work in food services, starting small by selling poultry and eggs at the municipal market. In 1949, Ruggero opened the family's first eponymous restaurant, Confeitaria e Restaurante Fasano, also serving Brazilian fare. It featured a glass facade on which the family's name was mounted in illuminated, cursive script. Three years later, he reclaimed the space that once housed Brasserie Paulista and reopened it. He also opened five additional establishments in the city, including a tea salon and a pastry shop.

According to Rogério, none of his grandfather's spots made as much of an impact as his largest restaurant, Jardim de Inverno Fasano. “It could accommodate 1,200 people,” says Rogério. “President Eisenhower was honored at a luncheon there. Fidel Castro ate there. Nat King Cole sang there.” The Fasano group also began catering. “My grandfather did every single wedding of Brazil’s elite for 25 years,” Rogério says. “Everybody told me he was known as the most elegant man in town, loved by the people.” Ruggero sold off the family name in 1963, three years before Fabrizio launched a whiskey company that produced the brands Old Eight and Brazilian Blend.

“My father wanted nothing to do with restaurants,” Rogério says. But when his whiskey business went bankrupt in the early '80s, he began to reconsider. At that time, Rogério was living in London. He had moved there with a friend, in part because he found Brazil's then-military government too oppressive to tolerate. He enrolled in a British film school and got a job pulling pints at a pub called the Dew Drop Inn, his first foray into hospitality. “I did it because I wanted to meet all kinds of people,” he says. “The idea was to leave Brazil and never go back.”

A sense of duty to his family drove Rogério to return to São Paulo in 1982. Around then, a developer approached Fabrizio about potentially opening a Fasano restaurant for the first time since the family name was sold. Fabrizio initially wanted to dismiss the opportunity, but Rogério wouldn't let him. After a visit to the family lawyer, Rogério says he learned that the Fasano name had been purchased by an Italian energy company. It had bought the building occupied by Jardim de Inverno Fasano as its offices; rights to the family name came along with the space. Rogério told a company executive he wanted the name back but had no money to purchase it. “In a month, the man calls me back and says he can’t give me the name because they’re a publicly traded company and accountable to shareholders,” says Rogério of the executive. “Then he says, ‘But we can sell it to you.’ And I asked, ‘But for how much?’ He says, ‘For one penny—can you afford one penny?’”

Shortly after the Fasano brand name was once again in the family's possession, Rogério, with his father as a partner, opened his first restaurant. "It was a disaster," he says. "We did everything wrong. We're an Italian family. We opened this French restaurant with this pretentious name, Jardin Gastronomique Fasano, and served nouvelle cuisine." Rogério's father told his son that the restaurant business "will kill you, you'll work like an idiot, you'll never have weekends." In response to that warning, Rogério, who suffered two strokes before the age of 50, recalls replying, "But I can handle that."

Six months after its opening, Jardin Gastronomique Fasano closed, but Rogério wouldn't be deterred. He decided to take a more personal approach, drawing on lessons he learned from his grandparents. As a boy, Rogério had spent days on end in their São Paulo home, savoring the Italian meals they cooked. "Everything my grandmother did, she did in such a careful way," Rogério says. "Pastas, risottos, Milanese veal, scaloppine."

In 1985, Rogério opened the Restaurante Fasano. "It was very high-end and successful," he says. But it wasn't easy to run. At the time, Rogério says that importing many foods into Brazil was illegal. He often had to rely on the black market to source the ingredients he needed, depending on a smuggler who bribed ship captains to ferry in items like prosciutto, polenta and Parmigiano-Reggiano. "Everybody who wanted Italian things had to go through him. It was like a comedy," says Rogério, who dabbled in smuggling himself, once trying to bring 1,000 Venetian artichokes into the country through the airport. "I was detained in customs," he says.

In 1990, Rogério moved the restaurant into a larger space and four years later opened a more casual trattoria, Gero, adjacent to it. "Then, I had a dream to open a hotel," he says. In 1996, Rogério bought a piece of land near his restaurants in the city's chic Jardins neighborhood and hired prominent Brazilian architects Isay Weinfeld and Marcio Kogan. The first Fasano hotel opened in 2003 with 60 rooms. According to Rogério, nearly 10,000 people came to the opening festivities, which spanned two days. "When we saw the word Fasano on the facade, we couldn't stop crying," says Rogério. "Isay and I had to leave the party. It was so emotional."

The end result blended elements of Brazilian and Italian modernism, expressed through rich leathers and dark woods, with the classic warmth of both countries. "Its essence lies in comfort and a timeless feeling," says Weinfeld, via email. Weinfeld and Rogério have collaborated on more than a dozen projects, including the hotels at Boa Vista and Punta del Este. Fasano Miami, slated for completion by 2020, will be their next joint effort. Weinfeld is the godfather to Rogério and interior designer Ana Joma Fasano's 11-year-old son, Vittorio. (Anna, Rogério's 26-year-old daughter from his first marriage, is a popular fashion blogger in Brazil.) "Rogério doesn't fall for any fads or trends," Weinfeld says.

The Fasano flagship restaurant, which Rogério moved inside the hotel upon its opening, exemplifies this ethos too. Restaurante Fasano accommodates 80 and features boothlike seating in the center of the room surrounded by tables dressed with white tablecloths and flanked by sleek leather chairs. "Ever since I was a kid, Fasano has always been synonymous with refinement," says Folha de S.Paulo gastronomy columnist Alexandra Forbes, "and that's reinforced every time I enter the triple-height, templelike space."

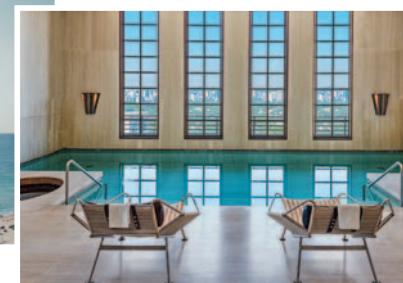

The menu, over which Rogério has final approval, includes dishes like pappardelle with egg and porcini and, as a nod to Ida Fasano, breaded Milanese veal chops. Alex Atala, one of Brazil's most acclaimed chefs, whose own São Paulo fine-dining flagship, D.O.M., opened in 1999 and who recently announced plans for his own first hotel, credits Rogério with elevating their city's level of taste. "He was the first here to really pay attention to the small details," says Atala. "His presence is everywhere."

Rogério says he's looking forward to completing his current slate of projects in Brazil, including Angra dos Reis, which marks his first Brazilian seaside resort development. It's about 100 miles from Rio and will have 54 rooms, three pools and boating access to 365 nearby islands. "My main focus from here on," he says, "will be abroad."

Although Rogério, who bought back the family name for a penny 35 years ago, sold the Fasano restaurant business to the Brazilian real-estate development firm JHSF for $24 million in 2014, he has managed to retain creative control. "My job has always been to create the whole thing," Rogério says. "It has to be personal. It's not just about the design or the food. It's about mood." •

BRIGHT FUTURES

How modernist pioneers Anni and Josef Albers became art stars for the 21st century.

BY CAROL KINO
PHOTOGRAPHY BY DANILO SCARPATI

HOW DO YOU MAKE an artist into a key figure of art history? Take the case of Josef and Anni Albers, today considered leading lights of 20th-century modernism. The couple emerged from Germany's innovative Bauhaus school, where he was a teacher and she a student. After the Nazis forced the school's closure in 1933, the Alberses fled to the United States and joined the founding faculty of Black Mountain College, in North Carolina. Josef oversaw the art department, and Anni taught weaving. Both left their mark on a student body that included future masters such as Robert Rauschenberg and Cy Twombly.

By midcentury, when modernist abstraction still ruled, both artists were in their heyday: In 1949, Anni, having already influenced a generation of designers, became the first textile artist to have a solo show at New York's Museum of Modern Art; a year later, Josef became the first director of Yale University's graduate design department, where he shaped the thinking of still more American artists, including Richard Serra and Eva Hesse. But from the 1970s on, as conceptualism, expressionist painting and other postmodernist movements came to the fore, the Alberses' brand of geometric abstraction and formal experimentation fell out of fashion.

Yet these days the couple suddenly seems to be everywhere: The coming year brings a crop of major Albers shows in Europe and New York, including Anni Albers: Touching Vision, opening October 6 at the Guggenheim Museum Bilbao—the artist's first retrospective since 1999—and Josef and Anni and Ruth and Ray, pairing the Alberses with Ruth Asawa and Ray Johnson, two of their students at Black Mountain.

Established by Josef five years before his 1976 death, the foundation has been helmed since 1979 by the art historian Nicholas Fox Weber, who met and became close to the Alberses in the early '70s as a graduate student at Yale. From a modest complex of buildings in a woodsy grove, a team of curators, researchers, visiting artists, archivists and restorers works to maintain the couple's legacy. (There is also an informal furniture gallery, called Trunk, open to scholars and students by appointment.) The chief curator, Brenda Danilowitz, began working there before Anni's death in 1994 and, like Fox Weber, knew her personally. Among other projects, the foundation staff track down the Alberses' work, aggressively weeding out fakes and buying back select pieces when possible, and pursue their own scholarship, opening up new avenues of exploration.

"I have never had a partner in any project as helpful as the foundation," says Maria Müller-Schareck, chief curator of modern and contemporary art at Düsseldorf's Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen museum, which together with London's Tate Modern is presenting Anni Albers, a major retrospective that ranges from $300,000 to over $2 million. (Zwirner is doing its part too, with a show opening September 20 called Josef and Anni and Ruth and Ray, pairing the Alberses with Ruth Asawa and Ray Johnson, two of their students at Black Mountain.)

opens next June in Düsseldorf and travels to London that October. "Altogether they seem to know everything about these artists. And Nick Weber, he tells his wonderful stories from dusk to dawn." Indeed, Fox Weber is a raconteur full of colorful anecdotes: the time he first met the Alberses at their house and Anni served him extra-crispy KFC on Rosenthal china because, she said, it was a ringer for classic Viennese fried chicken, or when Jacqueline Onassis told Anni that looking at Josef's work was like being in Matisse's Chapelle du Rosaire in Vence, France. More than one curator mentions the importance of his deep personal connection to the couple.

The fruits of the foundation's labors can be seen clearly in the two Guggenheim shows. Albers in Mexico radically repositions Josef with many works predating his Homage series, some of which will also appear. The exhibition includes his photographs and photo collages of Zapotec, Aztec and Mixtec pyramids and ruins; selections from his so-called Variant/Adobe paintings—hotly colored squares nested inside horizontal rectangles—and his Tenayuca series, which are geometric compositions that seem to balance flatness with three-dimensional space.

Among them is Tenayuca I, lost since it was purchased in 1947 and known only from a small black-and-white photograph. When the foundation began working with Zwirner, a relative of the original owner suddenly contacted the gallery about the work. "I got one look at it and said, 'We will buy it,'" Fox Weber says. "It's an extraordinary painting, in mint condition. And it's beautiful."

For Lauren Hinkson, the Guggenheim curator organizing the New York show, the painting was "a revelation," she says. "I've seen all the Tenayucas, and when I saw it hanging at the foundation, I almost got down on my knees to pray."

Hinkson hit upon the show's concept after discovering Josef's Mexican photographs in the Guggenheim's collection nine years ago. They struck her as an anticipation of the 1960s photographs of land artists like Robert Smithson and conceptual artists like Donald Judd. The foundation staff helped her expand on that idea, linking Josef's abstraction to the couple's fascination with Latin American archaeology. "When you think of Albers, you think of those squares," Hinkson says. "But the foundation helped me uncover a story that hasn't been told in this level of depth."

Meanwhile, in Touching Vision, curator Manuel Cirauqui intends to position Anni more broadly, as "an important artist," one whose work addresses, he says, "key issues for modernist painting from the perspective and materiality of so-called minor art forms." The show comprises wall hangings, pictorial weavings (as she began calling them in the U.S.) and

Hanging Out With JARED LETO

An Oscar-winning actor who is also a tech entrepreneur, stadium-filling rock star, fashion icon and successful Silicon Valley investor? Welcome to the high-flying life of Jared Leto.

ALL ON THE LINE
“I needed a very charismatic, magnetic presence, someone with the aura of a rock star,” says director Denis Villeneuve of casting Leto as Niander Wallace in Blade Runner 2049, a sequel to the 1982 sci-fi classic, out in October. Gucci jumpsuit, Christopher Shannon sneakers and his own T-shirt and socks.

WHEN JARED LETO'S people say the plan is to meet "at Jared's base," I assume it's a jet-setter's figure of speech—as in, last month he was rock climbing in Menorca, next month he's at Fashion Week in Milan, but Los Angeles is his base. But no—they mean an actual base: a decommissioned Air Force station tucked into the hills near Laurel Canyon, built during World War II to warn of incoming Japanese planes. The 100,000-square-foot compound, which Leto has called home since 2015, features 4-foot-thick concrete blast walls, a nuclear fallout shelter and a genuine air-traffic-control tower; it's slightly absurd that it exists 10 minutes from the Sunset Strip, much less that someone lives in it.

On the other hand, if anyone's going to inhabit a top-secret Cold War compound in the heart of Los Angeles, it's probably Jared Leto.

Leto has a long history of outlandishness, whether it's waxing his body and shedding more than 30 pounds to portray a transgender AIDS patient in Dallas Buyers Club, or sending his castmates condoms and a live rat while playing the Joker in last year's Suicide Squad. Beneath the theatrics, he's an industrious quintuple-threat: Oscar-winning actor, stadium-filling rock star (with his band, Thirty Seconds to Mars), digital-media entrepreneur, burgeoning fashion icon and—as if you don't hate him enough already—successful tech investor, whose long list of winning bets includes Uber, Snapchat, Spotify and Airbnb. "I joke sometimes that I get more done on a movie set than I do when I'm off," he says, "because I'm not as distracted."

We'd originally planned to go for a hike today—Leto's a big hiker—but it's sweltering in L.A., 94 in the shade, and he's been dealing with some back problems, so instead we're hanging in his backyard, a shady xeriscape with a sadly neglected pool. To relieve his back, Leto is sitting cross-legged on the ground, dressed in a white Gucci T-shirt, green Gucci jogging pants (from the women's collection) and a pair of worn-out gray Ugg slippers. His hair is its natural shade of chestnut, and his beard has achieved 1840s-prospector length. He also has the best posture I've ever seen. At 45, he looks almost exactly as he did nearly 25 years ago, when he first became famous playing the angst-filled heartthrob Jordan Catalano on My So-Called Life.

"I call him Babyface," says his friend Alessandro Michele, creative director at Gucci. "He is timeless—it is almost impossible to give him age. If Visconti were still alive, he would love to work with Jared."

Last night Leto was up late in the studio, working on his band's next album. He woke around 9 a.m.—no alarm, as usual—and enjoyed his standard breakfast of muesli and almond milk, then spent some time tending to his back—heat, ice; meditation. But leisurely appearances aside, "it's actually a super-busy time," Leto says. In a few days he's flying to Kazakhstan for a concert with the band; then he'll start getting ready to promote his new film, Blade Runner 2049—the much-anticipated sequel to the dystopian 1982 sci-fi classic, in which Harrison Ford played an L.A. cop hunting down rogue androids.

Leto still remembers the first time he saw the original on VHS. "It was one of those films I just connected with," he says. "I've watched it every couple of years." In the sequel, he has what he calls "a small part" as a character named Niander Wallace, who creates said androids, known in the Blade Runner universe as "replicants."

Denis Villeneuve, the director of the new film, says the inspiration for Leto's character was David Bowie. "I needed a very charismatic, magnetic presence, someone with the aura of a rock star," Villeneuve says. "But I also needed a great actor, because the lines he had to say were quite Shakespearean." The character is also blind, and true to form, Leto—who once hung out with homeless junkies in Manhattan's East Village to portray a heroin addict in Requiem for a Dream—dove in head-first. "We all heard stories about Jared, how he transforms into the characters," Villeneuve says. "But even this didn't prepare me for what was to come."

Not content to simply act blind, Leto decided to become blind, ordering customized contact lenses that made his eyes totally opaque. "He entered the room, and he could not see at all," Villeneuve recalls. "He was walking with an assistant, very slowly. It was like seeing Jesus walking into a temple. Everybody became super silent, and there was a kind of sacred moment. Everyone was in awe. It was so beautiful and powerful—I was moved to tears. And that was just a camera test!"

Leto stayed blind for the entire shoot, guided around set and never laying eyes on the rest of the cast. "That, for me, was insane," Villeneuve says. "But he really created something. Every time Jared came on set, it was a boost of energy, tension and excitement." (For his part, Leto says, he "didn't dive as deep down the rabbit hole as maybe I've done before, but I stayed really focused.") Of course, he didn't delude himself that he was actually blind. "I'm crazy," he says, "but I'm not insane."

As he sits here in his garden, it's easy to see the commitment that Leto can summon. He's incredibly calm and still, with no extraneous movements, like some lizardlike desert creature conserving energy in the heat. He listens intently, with laserlike eye contact, and he barely seems to blink. (Says Michele, "I call him a monk sometimes, because he's so concentrated.") With his ageless physicality and otherworldliness, he could almost be a replicant himself.

Villeneuve agrees. "He has a kind of eternal youth syndrome. But the thing I love about Jared is that he's really at peace with himself. He's a perfectionist. And like all rock stars, he has a bit of narcissism. But it's a narcissism that I can deal with."

WE'VE BEEN TALKING a while when Leto hops up and starts doing a little shake. I tell him to feel free to walk around or stretch if he needs to. "No," he says. "I was getting covered with ants. I'm going to make them work a little harder."

We retreat inside the safety of the base, where Leto offers to take me on a tour. Although he moved in a couple of years ago, the place remains a work in progress, with dingy floor tiles, scuffed white paint and the distinct odor of midcentury bureaucracy lingering in the halls. "I'm going to redo it at some point," Leto says, "make it nice. But I'm kind of just camping out."

We start in his bedroom. "It's fancy," Leto warns. But he opens the door to reveal a glorified walk-in closet, maybe 200 square feet, with small windows, a loveseat and a mattress sitting right on the floor. "It's amazing," Leto says, smiling. "When it comes down to it, you don't need very much." The only hint of luxury is a portable clothes rack that holds what looks like a small fortune in high-end apparel—most of it from his friend Michele at Gucci.

Recently Leto has become the label's face, both officially and unofficially, starring in a fragrance campaign and often rocking ensembles in public taken straight from the runway. The infatuation runs both ways: "I've been inspired by him many times," Michele says. "The way he puts gym pants with crazy hats or something—it's beautiful. He says, 'I don't care about fashion,' but it's not true. He's like the most fashionable gypsy you can imagine."

Leto seems amused that he's become a style icon—"There was a period a decade ago when I wore Hare Krishna clothes"—but he does admit to getting bolder and more confident with age. "When I was younger I was like, 'Give me something black,'" he says. "But now I love color. You know how you see old guys wearing loud Hawaiian shirts? If I walk off the bus, and the crew starts laughing, I know I put the right thing on."

We proceed deeper into the bowels of the house, passing large metal tins labeled SURVIVAL CRACKERS ("I haven't opened them yet") and a few doors marked USAF TOP SECRET. After World War II ended, the base became a military film studio, churning out propaganda films hosted by the likes of Jimmy Stewart. "There are so many crazy rumors about this place," Leto says. "Everything from 'Part of the moon landing was filmed here' to 'They used to keep prisoners downstairs.' They had laboratories. They were doing all kinds of God-knows-what." He is clearly enamored by this.

In one of the building's subbasements, we pass Leto's home gym (with photos of Schwarzenegger and Bruce Lee) and then the garage where he keeps his vintage Ford Bronco—a metallic-blue beast with orange flames down the side, a birthday gift from his brother, Shannon. "He was like, 'You can get it repainted,'" Leto says, "and I was like, 'No way, man! I used to have a little Tonka truck that looked just like that.'" The Letos grew up poor, on food stamps in Louisiana, with a hippie single mom who encouraged them to follow their artistic dreams. Leto studied film and photography at the School of Visual Arts in Manhattan before dropping out and moving to L.A. in hopes of becoming a director. He started acting, and a few years later talked Shannon into moving out to start a band.

Next we walk through a hangarlike storage room Leto calls "the warehouse," full of Thirty Seconds to Mars's road cases and gear, and from there emerge onto the base's old soundstage, which Leto has repurposed as a recording studio and rehearsal space. "We had an acoustician come by, and he said we have the same reverb as Abbey Road,” Leto says. “Isn’t that wild?” In the control room, an engineer is going over mixes from last night’s session, tweaking the vocal tracks for the band’s new single (“Walk on Water,” released in August). “I’d say we’re 80 percent done,” Leto says of the album. He smiles: “But I’ve been saying that for two years.”

Back upstairs, Leto starts to grow a bit bored. “I can show you more, but it’s really big,” he says. “It just keeps going and going and going.” He knows it’s kind of silly for a bachelor pad. “But it works for me,” he says. “I can do creative stuff here, I can live here. And I don’t have to sit in traffic.”

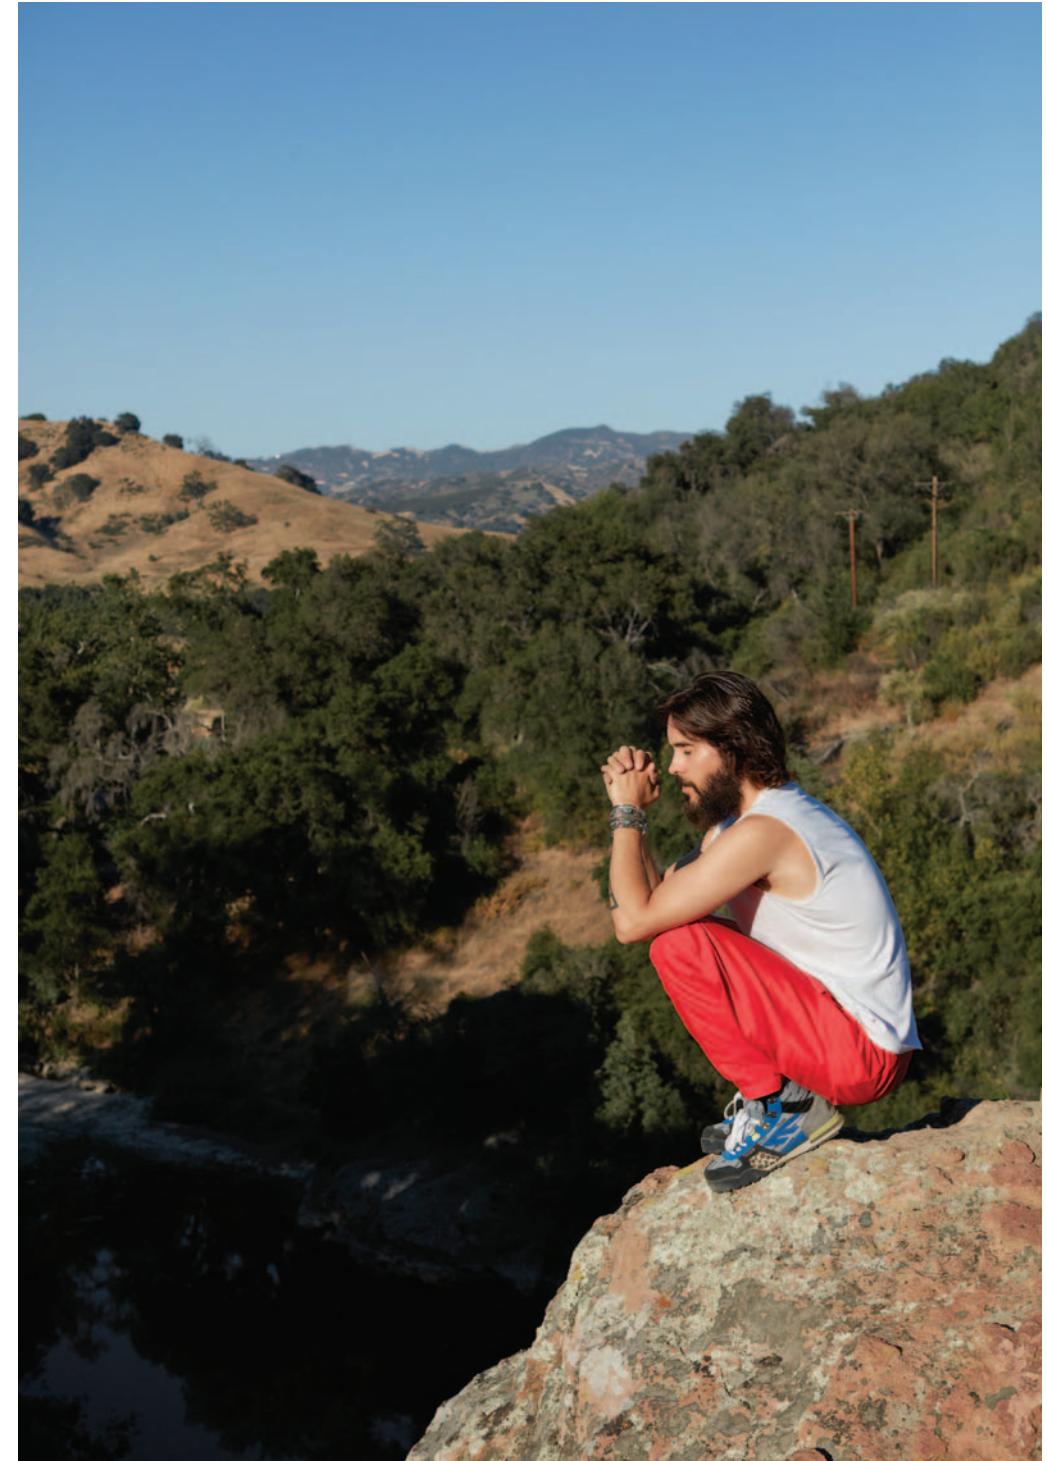

There’s one last oddity he wants to point out: a skylight in the middle of the floor that peers down into a small enclosure, maybe 8 feet square, with no discernible doors. It looks suspiciously like a dungeon. “Weird, right?” says Leto, grinning. He slips into a pitch-perfect impression of Buffalo Bill from The Silence of the Lambs: “Put the lotion in the basket!” he booms, cracking up. I point out that at least the skylight unlatches from the inside, leaving open the possibility of escape. “Yeah,” he says, “but you’d have to get up there first”—a sheer 10-foot climb with no holds. He smiles deviously. “Give ‘em just enough hope to keep ‘em alive.”

IT’S NEARING TIME for Leto to say goodbye: His next appointment is already waiting, some people from a tech giant. At the moment, Leto is looking for a buyer for his digital streaming platform, VyRT, a company he started in 2011 to live-stream his band’s concerts. That was his second foray into the tech world; previously he had launched a digital-marketing company called the Hive, and over the past decade has become a serious tech investor, backing more than 50 startups including Uber, Snapchat, Reddit, Spotify, Slack and Nest.

“He’s very different from the normal cats from Hollywood and L.A. I see playing around the Valley,” says Nest co-founder Tony Fadell, whose company Leto invested in three years before it was acquired by Google for $3.2 billion, in 2014. (Leto didn’t disclose the size of his investment, but Fadell says for “an individual, it was a significant amount of money.”) “A lot of people from that world say, ‘My manager’s gonna take care of it, my agent’s gonna take care of it’—they don’t worry about the details,” Fadell adds. “And a lot of people are meddlers or know-it-alls who want to lead from the bench. That was not his thing. Jared is very curious, very detail-oriented; he really gets involved, and he really understands. He only added value.”

“I was actually really impressed,” says Stewart Butterfield, a co-founder of Slack, which Leto invested in in 2014. “Jared gave a lot of feedback, and all of it was very practical, specific, concrete feedback about usability and improving the platform. He found the right balance,” Butterfield adds, “between persistent and irritating.”

When it comes to his investing philosophy, Leto says, “I like to learn. So if I can be involved in a company that teaches me something, I’m happy.” There are also a few deals he passed on and still kicks himself over. “Oh, my God, are you kidding?” Leto says. “There are some doozies. I can’t [talk about it]—I’ll have to call a therapist.”

All these side hustles aside, Leto’s not giving up his day job anytime soon. He’s attached to play Andy Warhol in an upcoming biopic written by Terence Winter (The Wolf of Wall Street), and he’ll soon be directing his first feature, a police thriller called 77 with a script by L.A. noir legend James Ellroy. Leto—a devoted rock climber who sometimes posts his best ascents to Instagram along with a monkey emoji—has previously directed a documentary series on America’s national parks called Great Wide Open as well as several music videos.

“Always when you are around Jared Leto, you are in Jared Leto’s theater,” Denis Villeneuve says. “It’s like a play—you become a character. But he’s having fun with it, and he brings you in his game. You just fall in love with him.”

If there’s one thing Leto hasn’t done but would like to, it’s a comedy. Sadly, no one ever asks. “I might not be at the top of the list for, like, a funny dude,” he says. “But if someone is dying or suffering greatly, I’ll get a call.” He laughs ruefully. “I got calls about [playing] Charles Manson, Ted Bundy, David Koresh and Jim Jones, all within two weeks. I’m not doing them,” he adds, “but I thought for a second, ‘Oh, my God, I should do them all.’ Just put them together like a Criterion Collection box set. And then retire.” •

Palais Intrigue

In a corner of Marrakech's medina, French iconoclast Bernard-Henri Lévy has restored and expanded the Palais de la Zahia—a place to retreat to with his wife, Arielle Dombasle, while communing with the riad's storied past.

BY SARAH MEDFORD PHOTOGRAPHY BY STEPHEN KENT JOHNSON

THE FRENCH FILM Day and Night seemed to have a lot going for it on the eve of its release in February 1997. The romantic drama, which co-starred Alain Delon and Arielle Dombasle (with Lauren Bacall in a minor role), had been bankrolled by French luxury-goods magnate François Pinault and his friend André Lévy, an industrialist who was also the father of its director, the celebrated writer Bernard-Henri Lévy. But the critical response was immediate—and brutal. The chastened director and his leading lady, who was also his wife, escaped to Delon's holiday home in Morocco, tucked away in the medina of Marrakech. They swam in its palm-shaded pool and took sun on the crenelated roof terrace, which overlooks the Koutoubia Mosque and most of the ancient pink-walled city.

"We came supposedly for one week, and after the week I told him, 'I don't want to move! I'll buy it,'"

Lévy says of the house. Delon demurred, according to Lévy, but not for long. "A new lady in his life—a Pol Pot of the feelings—was making things difficult for him. And finally, he said, 'Why not? I'll sell.'"

Lévy and Dombasle acquired the Palais de la Zahia, as it is known, in 1998. Over the past two decades, they've expanded the centuries-old riad with additional guest rooms, public and private areas for sheltering from the day's heat and gardens that alternately delineate and obscure its meandering courtyards. From the start, they've worked on the project with their friend Louis Benech, France's pre-eminent landscape designer.

The historic palace has remained a hushed, bewitching getaway from the couple's home in Paris. Lévy, in particular, has taken a keen interest in the characters who have passed through its doors, including the feudal warlord Thami el Glaoui, diplomat Hubert Lyautey—the first French resident-general in Morocco—and the Swiss writer-adventurer Isabelle Eberhardt.

In 1966, Palais de la Zahia took a dip into the counterculture when John Paul Getty Jr. purchased it as a wedding present for his second wife, the Dutch model Talitha Pol. Getty's father, J. Paul Getty Sr., was listed that year in The Guinness Book of World Records as the world's richest private citizen for his holdings in the oil company he'd co-founded, and soon a rivulet of Senior's cash was making its way into a full restoration of the palace. Leading the work was Bill Willis, a Memphis-born antiques dealer and self-taught decorator who'd already cut a swath with the younger Gettys through Morocco. The couple's hedonistic days and nights at La Zahia were summed up in a now-famous image taken by Patrick Lichfield for Vogue in 1969, in which Talitha, dressed in an embroidered djellaba, harem pants and white go-go boots, lounges before Paul on the darkening roof terrace. (Two years later she died of a heroin overdose in their Rome apartment, after which Getty sold the Marrakech house.)

Lévy finds the flamboyant and somewhat debauched history of La Zahia intriguing. Trailing the Gettys to its door was a creative coven that included Yves Saint Laurent and Pierre Bergé, Marianne Faithfull, Gore Vidal and Michelangelo Antonioni, among others. "My passion is really the memoirs," he says. "The house was documented as the only place on earth where the Beatles met the Rolling Stones. They spent a Christmas here together. A few nights, with their ladies." The episode was recorded by Fabrice Gaignault in his 2006 book, Sixties Muses; Lévy mentions that he also corroborated it with his houseman, Mohsine, who was born at La Zahia and whose late father looked after it before him.

Mohsine has just delivered a tray bearing espresso in porcelain cups to the terrace, where Lévy is relaxing after his morning swim, dressed in an aloe-green bath towel and wraparound sunglasses. He regrets not meeting Paul Getty in person, he says. "One of his sons came back here one day, with great emotion, and wanted to make a sort of pilgrimage. I think he was happy with how we've kept it, I don't know."

The French couple bring their own version of celebrity to La Zahia. Dombasle, after several decades as an actress, has segued into a career as a singer and occasional film director. (Her latest, the 2013 Opium, was inspired by Jean Cocteau's classic memoir.) Wasp-waisted and vivacious, Dombasle is the shimmering sun to Lévy's taciturn moon. He's a writer-adventurer in the spirit of Eberhardt, hitting the road in dusty, perilous landscapes in search of a story, and is best known as an outspoken public intellectual, a self-described humanist who has taken controversial stands on matters of international policy—most recently in Bosnia, Libya and across the Middle East.

Now 68, Lévy came onto the French scene in the 1970s, first as a war correspondent for the left-wing newspaper Combat and then as the author of Barbarism With a Human Face, an impassioned repudiation of Marxism. A fortune accrued by his father in the timber business has allowed him to lead a comfortable life, and he pursues projects only as they interest him. The list is long: Lévy has produced so much—and had so many professional ups and downs—that they are beyond count. His 2006 book American Vertigo, subtitled Traveling America in the Footsteps of Tocqueville, was a bestseller in the U.S. as well as France despite an incendiary review by Garrison Keillor in the New York Times that began, "Any American with a big urge to write a book explaining France to the French should read this book first, to get a sense of the hazards involved." Alternately celebrated and lampooned in the French press for his high-minded exploits (he's regularly entarté, or given a pie in the face), Lévy has been rebranded in France simply as "BHL." He is also a dandy and a well-documented ladies' man: If BHL had his own emoji, it would sport a black suit and a white Charvet shirt with a stand-up collar, open at the neck.

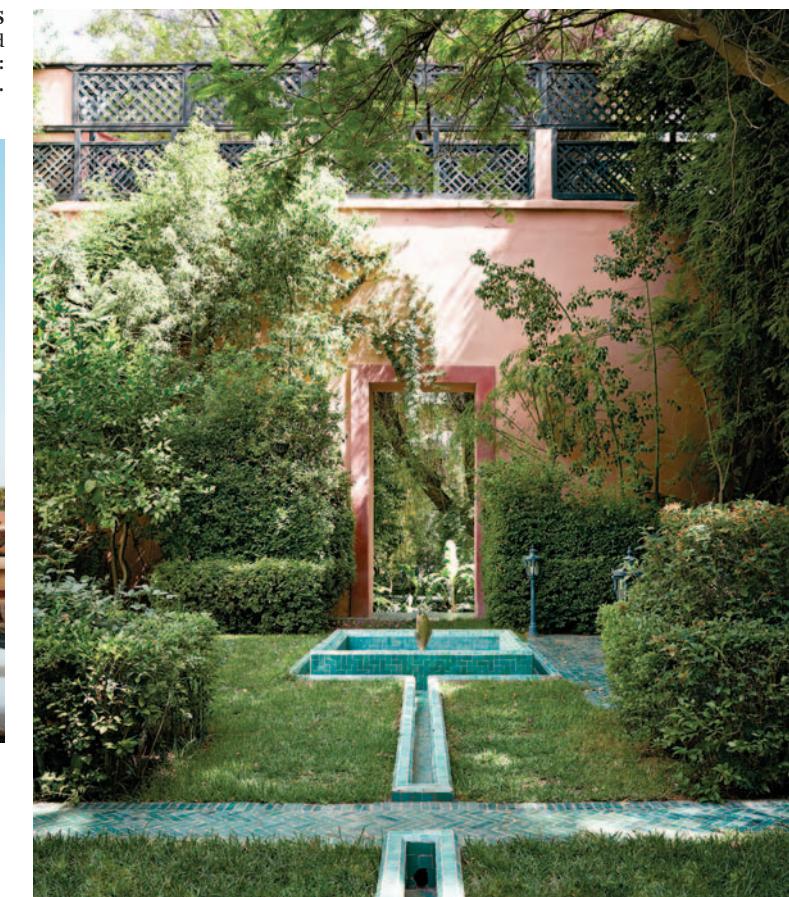

In Marrakech, Lévy works to the exclusion of almost everything else. "I never move from here," he says, glancing around the densely shaded courtyard. "I work all day. And all evening. Sometimes I'm alone, and sometimes it's a good way to get work done." He admits that he leaves a lot of the details surrounding La Zahia to Dombasle.

"My wife likes making a house," Lévy says. "What I like in a house is people. The history. My history—and the people who came before. This is a little bit of a haunted house."

PALAIS DE LA ZAHIA is unquestionably a big house, a grand riad that dates to the 16th or the 18th century, depending on whom you ask. Thought to have been built by the Glaoui, or ruling passahs, of Marrakech, it bears all the markings of a rich man's trophy: rooms faced in zellige (glittering, richly patterned mosaic tile); cedar-wood ceilings, almost Nordic in their intricate floral motifs, carved and painted with botanical dyes; deep, arched fireplaces and walls of tadelakt (glazed and pigmented plaster). At some point, a smaller riad was annexed to the larger one and used as a harem. As Mohsine explains, this is where Marlon Brando spent a few months shacked up with the Gettys in the late '60s.

The first time Lévy and Dombasle returned to La Zahia as its owners, they brought along Benech and his then-partner, Christian Louboutin, to consult on various home improvements. "As a person, I like Louis's tenderness," Lévy says. "And as a professional, I love that he believes plants are living creatures. He really communicates with plants. They are the partners of his life."

Lévy has soaked up a bit of this thinking himself. "Louis taught me that plants had a life," he says. "And strangely enough, he convinced me of my relation to this world. The Americans love their dogs and their cats. For me, perhaps it's pet plants. Introduced by Louis Benech. 'Mr. Lévy, meet your pet plant.'"

Benech got his start among the rain-misted gardens of Normandy, but several early projects had introduced him to North Africa's parched, unremitting climate, and the challenges of garden making there fueled his imagination. "The landscape tradition in Morocco is a bit Alhambresque," he says from the terrace of his Paris home and office, a modest townhouse in the ninth arrondissement. "There is sometimes a big reservoir surrounded by fruit trees—citrus or olive, as in the Agdal Gardens of Marrakech. And then there is the riad garden, an interior courtyard with raised walkways and sunken beds. It's a gravitational watering system—though not as clever as the ones in Iran."

In the early '80s, Benech designed a slim water canal in the Moorish style at Dar Zuylen, the estate of Guy and Marie-Hélène de Rothschild in the Palmerie, a new residential community outside the medina. "It was lined with artichokes, which have such a beautiful leaf," he says. Having stayed at the house one summer, Lévy and Dombasle craved a canal of their own. Beyond that, their requests for La Zahia were personal: Dombasle wanted a certain apricot rose, a hybrid tea named Just Joey; her husband wanted the world in microcosm.

"My little idea," Lévy explains, "was that in this house, you should be able to experiment with Barefoot and still draped in a towel, Lévy rises from a velvet-cushioned campaign chair and pads through an arched doorway in the courtyard to an area he annexed some years after buying the house. The transition is from night to day: A sun-struck garden in fiery oranges and yellows encircles a newly built wing. Here Benech planted citrus trees and fragrant, trailing moonflower, wisteria and jasmine vines to make an opulent stage for the hybrid tea roses Dombasle favors, which are laced among hibiscus and an almost-vermillion lantana to ensure that the garden is constantly in color. Flowing down the middle is a turquoise-tiled canal that culminates in a small pool where calla lilies, bird of paradise and other showy bloomers perform.

"Although it looks wild, it's very geometric," Dombasle says of the rectangular plot. "Louis makes very sophisticated gardens that never look like gardens à la française. It's not his style at all. But he's so passionate."

Renowned for his encyclopedic knowledge of plants, Benech prefers using native species whenever possible. In Marrakech, frustrated by the poor selection of natives in the nurseries, he resorted at one point to smuggling in seeds and seedlings from abroad, a practice that soon took on a narcotic allure. He supplemented his stowaways with local specimen plants scavenged one by one. "Louis was like a collector who knows that a piece of art exists somewhere, and he has to find it," Lévy says. "He four-poster bed painted like the Good Ship Lollipop in a fantasia of ice cream colors and Berber-inspired motifs. In Talitha Getty's former boudoir, Dombasle stirred Willis's haute-bohemian pot by placing a red-satin chaise once owned by the Italian fashion designer Elsa Schiaparelli beside a soaking tub paved with psychedelic zellige tiles. "It's so amusing," Dombasle says of the result, taking a drag on her cigarette and smiling.

CERTAIN ROOMS at La Zahia still breathe the stately air of the 19th century. When the couple host late dinners for friends, a long table in one of the salons is set with colored votive candles, and the fireplace is lit on cool evenings.

Lévy says he prefers to dine at home. "In 20 years, I never went to a dinner, a party, to a lunch here." This sounds unbelievable, but he insists. "People come from abroad," he says. "A coterie, no. But it's a place where my best friends come. And sometimes the house has been used to have people meet, and take time together discreetly." Meaning? "A few political discussions have taken place here," he says cryptically. "In 2000, there were some meetings, some talks here. Between Israelis and Palestinians. In 2011, there were some talks with Libya, factions of the Libyan revolution. But generally, it is not that. Generally, it is really a place for me to write and to get together with my friends."

The Middle East has been Lévy's focus for more than a decade, and in the past two years he's made a pair of documentaries on the rise of ISIS. "As you can guess, you don't come back from such an adventure absolutely intact," he says of filming in northern Iraq. "It takes time, and I am...in recovery." To ease back into the general public discourse, he's working on a new book about populism, he says. "Trump, Putin, Europe. How to understand it, how to get rid of it."

Reconciling the many contrasts of Lévy's life is no easy matter, a fact that becomes even clearer after a trip to La Zahia's basement, where a series of rooms is lined with images of him and a galaxy of acquaintances from childhood to the present.

Cameos by everyone from his two children, his two ex-wives, Omar Sharif, Nicolas Sarkozy and Charlie Rose to camo-clad soldiers and Russian dissidents tell an unfathomable number of stories. Benech refers to the place as "the Dombaslothèque"—where the still-glamorous chanteuse lets loose in the evenings to entertain friends. "This is a crazy place," Lévy says, before leading the way through to the underground gym.

In 2000, on a trip to Tangier, Lévy fell in love with the view from a clifftop bluff and asked the late French designer Andrée Putman to build him a contemporary villa there. The two Moroccan houses couldn't be more different, he says—"Like Mac and PC. Like Beatles and Rolling Stones. Like Racine and Corneille." In July, though, he put the pristine Tangier house on the market; he rarely found himself going there. Instead, he's been spending more time in the ancient arms of La Zahia. He can be alone here, to a point. "This is a very old house, with many ghosts. Good ghosts." • all sorts of relationships between shadow and light. There should be a place for sunlight, for deep shadow, for coolness and for burning heat. A place for being surrounded by plants and then seeing plants at a distance. Not a variety of plants, but a variety of behaviors of me and my friends. I wanted the framework to be set in order to create a variety of relationships with plants."

Benech says he doesn't recall this dialectical tale, but the result was achieved anyway—in its beguiling complexity, La Zahia offered a range of horticultural opportunities. The existing trees in the riad's courtyard garden were magnificent: jacarandas, figs, palms, flame trees and Persian silk trees approaching the height of the upper-story bedrooms. At eye level, though, the sunken beds looked empty and rather sad. Lévy and Dombasle suggested raising the soil to the level of the green-tiled walkways, but Benech argued that this would "strangle" the trees. Instead, he persuaded them to plant a proper understory mixed with potted ferns and flowering climbers—rosy pink bougainvillea, persimmon-hued crossvine—that would soon infiltrate the courtyard with a primitive jungle on the order of Henri Rousseau. "At the time of the Gettys, there were just the big trees," Lévy says. "Now there is a sort of clever and wild composition, and it is like this all year round."

would take a car to the desert and come back with a little pot. Now the plants are not so little. It was a big commitment, and he did it with heart."

The same could be said for Lévy's expansion of the illustrious riad. "This is a little more than a house, so there is a transmission that has to be true and consistent, a legacy," he explains. "I did not change it. I added. And I got in touch with Bill Willis, because I wanted the same spirit as the Gettys. But Bill worked in close contact with Louis."

Willis had stayed on in Marrakech after restoring Palais de la Zahia in the '60s, becoming the city's unlikely shaman of the decorative arts. "Bill created the Marrakech look, and it started with that house," says the decorator Jacques Grange, who visited La Zahia with Yves Saint Laurent in 1972. "Yves was very close friends with Talitha. She had died by then, but we spent time there with Paul."

In 2002, Willis reprised his role at La Zahia. Then in his 60s and somewhat of a recluse, the designer threw out one far-fetched idea after the next, and Benech—with input from Louboutin, who is no slouch when it comes to houses—did what he could to shape them into workable plans. Willis died in 2009, and Lévy and Dombasle emerged from the adventure with a few choice stories. They still use the furniture Willis designed for the Gettys, including a

As Rag & Bone's co-founder Marcus Wainwright strikes out on his own, he continues his career-long quest to challenge and expand our understanding of what constitutes fashion.

ILIVED AND BREATHED for these people. They got us started." It's not every day that a New York-based CEO of a globally successful apparel company gets choked up talking about the workers in a small factory in the hills of Kentucky. But this is not your central-casting CEO. It's Marcus Wainwright, the 42-year-old co-founder of Rag & Bone, the maker of downtown-inspired American sportswear, talking about the company's earliest chapters.

Back in 2001, Wainwright, like many 20-something Englishmen before him, gravitated to New York City, first the East Village and then Williamsburg. He'd ditched his home country and a fledgling career in the telecom industry, looking for a new adventure. He was besotted with American denim but not overly enchanted by the boot-cut, distressed jeans then making their '70s comeback, nor the other varieties with their fanciful washes, stitching and pockets. Wainwright decided to make his own—but he had no clue how to do it. The first attempts were disasters. They "didn't really work out," he deadpans. He didn't know how to make a proper pattern; what he came up with was more like a child's drawing. But Wainwright pressed on, not so much as a beneficiary of the Dunning-Kruger effect—the presumably blissful phenomenon whereby an incompetent person is too incompetent to recognize his or her own incompetence—but through a combination of audacity, obsession and nagging curiosity about how jeans are actually made. Along the way, he picked up two British fellow travelers, Nathan Bogle and David Neville, making Rag & Bone a trio, and at a certain point a connection was made to Kentucky Apparel, a manufacturer in Tompkinsville, Kentucky. (It's not far from Bugtussle, Mud Lick and Flippin, if you're looking at a map.) By 2004, Wainwright got what he was looking for: a raw, selvage jean (in denim from Japan's legendary Kaihara mill) that actually fit a human male. He walked a backpack full of them into Isa, a tiny boutique near his place in Williamsburg, and talked the owner into buying a handful of jeans, chinos and T-shirts. Rag & Bone was off and running.

Wainwright—a rangy guy with tousled hair and a few days' scruff who looks like he could hold his own at both a billiard table and a board meeting—still rhapsodizes about Kentucky Apparel and the expert craftspeople there who guided his greenhorn operation along. He remembers "Mike Scruggs, just sitting in his office with no windows, with his cigarette hanging out of his mouth, watching him make a pattern." There was Betty Gentry, who hand-sewed the "R&B" logo on the back pocket of each pair of first-run Rag & Bone jeans (which, no doubt, are now collectors' items in the superheated world of denimphilia). But the new business that Wainwright and Co. brought to Kentucky Apparel wasn't enough to save the factory, and it closed in 2005. "I was devastated," Wainwright says, as much for the impact on the people who had made their livelihoods there as for his own shaky enterprise. Rag & Bone moved on to a factory in Micaville, North Carolina, called Taylor Togs. The workers there viewed Wainwright as a kind of savior. The place closed down in 2007.

The heartbreak of watching these small factories, and American jobs, vanish was galvanizing for Wainwright and his partners: "That was how Rag & Bone started as a concept," he says. "Clothes, for me—and Rag & Bone, for me—have got to stand for something greater than fashion."

TEN YEARS ON, Wainwright remains committed to keeping the beyond-fashion, artisanal ethos alive at Rag & Bone. The company still favors small, old-line factories and mills, from Japan (Kaihara is still the denim of choice) to Peru (for cotton henleys and polos) to Los Angeles, where its jeans—which have become modern style icons—are now sewn. (A few occasional items are produced in China.) Rag & Bone continues to celebrate intimacy, authenticity, durability and craft, even as it creeps along at its own, Wainwright-dictated pace, slowly becoming a brand that looks poised to take on the wider, competitive world of retail. Last year's revenue, as reported by the industry news site the Business of Fashion, was projected to be around $300 million.

The year 2017 has proven to be pivotal for the company, whose headquarters occupy a brick warehouse in Manhattan's Meatpacking District. (Long-retired meat hooks are still visible here and there throughout the offices.) On four hive-like floors, more than 300 employees keep Rag & Bone humming; the feeling here is more workshop than corporate fashion house. It's been a decade since it moved into its current quarters and emerged as an integral part of a broad rethink of men's style, a movement that saw the rise of Freemans Sporting Club, Michael Bastian and Thom Browne, along with the surge in heritage, workwear and urban lumberjackism, all offering new ways to reconceive the manly classics.

Wainwright's glassed-in office is on the sixth floor. The walls, much like those of your typical Rag & Bone shop, are exposed brick. There are signed LPs by the National and Mumford & Sons along the windowpane. (Wainwright is a music fan, particularly of Radiohead, whose frontman, Thom Yorke, has composed music for Rag & Bone projects and has DJ'd company events.) A poster outlining the taxonomy of Leica cameras leans against one wall, and a precarious pile of art books creeps up another, topped with Robert Frank's The Americans. There's one big, boxy desk in the middle of all of this man-cave clutter, mounted with a BEST DAD EVER sign. (Wainwright and his wife, the former model Glenna Neece, have three children and live in a Victorian-era townhouse in the Cobble Hill section of Brooklyn.)

"It's a complete mess at the moment," Wainwright says of his workspace. "This is mid-overhaul." It's in flux because it is the office he shared for Gucci Westman.) Wainwright and Neville had made an imposing, not to mention highly marketable, duo: two handsome English dudes with smarts to spare, beautiful and accomplished wives, keen social instincts and great connections, including Anna Wintour, an early champion of the brand. The big boost came in 2006 when Andrew Rosen, CEO of Theory, took them under his wing, making a significant investment in the company, which he still holds. That was a year after they unveiled the women's collection, which came to represent a majority of the business within a few years. In 2007, the upstarts, having already gone way beyond denim, won the CFDA's Swarovski Award for Emerging Talent in menswear.

Wainwright designed the clothes, while Neville, who left an investment-banking gig to join Rag & Bone, took care of the books and kept an eye on the big picture. ("The fact that I now have to talk about finances and stuff is fairly painful," Wainwright admits.) In the year since Neville's departure, Wainwright's restlessness, along with a touch of contrarianism, has been more conspicuous than ever in the company's approach. In February, during New York's Fashion Week, Wainwright celebrated the brand's 15th anniversary with a "Damn Good Party"—a blowout with an accompanying photo show—rather than the traditional runway extravaganza. He remains noncommittal about ever doing another Rag & Bone runway show: "I'd rather take everyone out for lunch," he says, citing an advertising and retail climate that is changing faster than anyone can keep up with. In April, at the Tribeca Film Festival, Rag & Bone screened a five-minute short film, called Hair, directed by John Turturro, the most ambitious example yet of Wainwright's exploration of visual media as a means of communicating the company's outlook.

WAINWRIGHT'S DIPLOMAT father was stationed in Athens when Marcus was born, in 1975. He sent his son to English public schools, where the dress code was pure boredom. "I wore a uniform from the age of 8," Wainwright says. As a teenager at Wellington College, a boarding school in the Berkshire countryside, Wainwright met Neville.

Wainwright ended up at Newcastle University for his undergrad studies. "Smoked a little weed and didn't do much work" is how he sums it up. He didn't impact of early Rag & Bone. "They were cool guys living in New York City, and this was how they wanted to dress. J.Crew was ubiquitous, but this was something else." That something was an unexpected mixture: all-American raw jeans and cotton T-shirts, with a smattering of leather and militaria, all turned out with a Savile Row attention to detail. Like the Beatles and the Stones with rock 'n' roll, Wainwright and his cohorts took something quintessentially American, ran it through a filter of British cool and sold it back to America.

They priced their goods right down the middle—between Lanvin and Levi's—bringing streetwear up to the level of fashion while bringing fashion down to street level. (A pair of men's Standard Issue jeans or chinos now runs about $250; the women's equestrian-inspired Simone Pant is $295.) The bet paid off. The original shop opened on Christopher Street in September 2008, just as the economy was melting down, and it is still holding its own. The layerable, matching, wearable, built-to-last Rag & Bone line was perfectly engineered for the person who thought a lot about not wanting to have to think about it.

"They just care about having great clothes," Wainwright says of his customers. "All the time."

Rag & Bone operates 27 retail shops around the world, from New York to Los Angeles, Dubai to London, where it opened a flagship (along with its European headquarters) in Soho this past spring. The next outpost opens in Miami's Design District later this fall, in time for the arrival of the international art posse at Art Basel Miami Beach in December. Rag & Bone stores tend toward exposed brick, wood, patinated steel, clothing racks made from industrial piping. Like the clothes, these environments are all about materials, durability, refinement and comfort, with a dash of raffishness. At the men's shop in Tribeca, you might find Dr. Dre's "Deez Nuuuts" playing on a turntable and a chatty staff offering a pour from a bar stocked with small-batch bourbons.

The fixtures for these stores come out of the Rag & Bone Custom Fabrication Shop, which, since 2011, has operated out of a 13,000-square-foot space in the hipster-industrial complex known as Industry City, Brooklyn. Here, 10 craftsmen create shelving, tables, racks and other accoutrements according to Wainwright's needs. On a recent visit, heavy antique hangers (another Wainwright obsession) were being modified for use in window displays. They're not for sale, but a collection of pleasingly angular forged-brass tchotchkes—bottle opener, money clip, belt buckle—will be soon; they're being developed for the 2017 holiday season.

The fabrication shop speaks to that hands-on, crafted quality of everything Rag & Bone, from jeans and chinos to skirts and field jackets: The stuff looks made. Wainwright manages to bring this ethos to the brand's celebrated imaging campaigns—photo projects, video clips, short films. They're light on branding and product and heavy on aesthetics and barbershop. The only clue that Rag & Bone had anything to do with it is contained in two smart-alecky lines. Turturro: "You look good in those clothes, I'll tell you that much." Cannavale: "This is what the kids are wearing now."

Maureen Chiquet, the former global CEO of Chanel, who recently signed on as a consultant to Rag & Bone, tells me: "Some brands just want to do the latest, greatest thing. Marcus would rather do something in a quality way than do something that isn't right for the brand. There's a real artistry about what Marcus is up to."

AFTERNOON winds down at Rag & Bone headquarters, Wainwright takes a seat at a long table and watches operatives present various designs and fits for his approval. Soon enough, another season of Rag & Bone will hit the shops—Linton tweeds, a shearling jacket, relaxed jeans (welcome back, '90s!), a leather-jacket collaboration with Schott. In January, the brand will launch Rag & Bone eyewear, teaming up with the old-school Italian maker Safilo. Going forward, he'll no doubt keep extending the complex ecosystem—clothing, visuals, design—that has come to define Rag & Bone.

Wainwright admits that being a solo voice in charge is a big change. "It's positive in many ways," he says. "I now have only myself to blame if it goes wrong." •

A MOCA FOR AFRICA

NEARLY THREE MONTHS before opening day, the double front doors of the Zeitz Museum of Contemporary Art Africa, the first major museum devoted to new art from the continent, are sealed like a vault. The interiors, by London architect Thomas Heatherwick—his first building in Africa—have been kept under wraps in an effort to build anticipation. From the outside, the building gives little away. New lantern windows bulge from its tower wing, the only apparent addition to this industrial-age artifact, a 96-year-old grain silo on the Cape Town waterfront stripped of its gungy magnolia paint down to gray concrete.

Inside, Heatherwick has carved a space from 42 steel and concrete grain-storage tubes, a soaring atrium hugged by white-box galleries—more than 100 of them on six floors—that curators and art handlers are already filling with sculpture, photography, film and paintings. “Normally with buildings the most iconic bit is the outside,” says Heatherwick, touring the museum in early July. “We thought, What if we made it the inside—an innie rather than an outie?”

Glass elevators shooting past spiral staircases access a roof garden inspired by the Metropolitan Museum of Art’s in New York. On the climate-controlled floors below, designed to meet international standards for traveling shows, cowhides capturing the body contours of South African artist Nandipha Mntambo (the subject of an opening retrospective) are being installed in one room, while photomontages from Kudzanai Chiurai of Zimbabwe lean against walls in another.

The Zeitz museum, launching this month, focuses on 21st-century work and aims to offer an inclusive look at the African art scene today, with a big-tent approach featuring African, expat and diaspora artists. Though it’s largely the vision of its executive director and chief curator, Mark Coetzee, a Cape Town artist turned curator, it would never have happened without the man whose name is inscribed above the door.

African contemporary art has long been the purview of private collectors. Unlike other big players in this emerging sector, Jochen Zeitz began his collection a decade ago with a museum in mind. “The story I wanted to tell is a story I wouldn’t tell but that Africa would tell itself,” he says.

ZEITZ, 54, is an old-fashioned polymath: adventurer, linguist, business prodigy and conservation crusader. One of the youngest CEOs in German corporate history—he was 30 when he took over a nearly bankrupt Puma—he speaks seven languages including Swahili, flies his own biplane, leads wildlife treks through the African bush and is the co-author, with Benedictine monk Anselm Grün, of a book about the spiritual aspects of business. In 2013, he launched the B Team with Richard Branson, a nonprofit devoted to sustainability that lobbied world leaders during the Paris climate talks. “We have similar views on people and humanity and how the world is,” says Branson.

Zeitz also helped craft strategy for luxury conglomerate Kering (PPR at the time)—which took a controlling stake in Puma in 2007—by introducing an environmental component to its profit and loss statement. “Jochen was very advanced in his thinking,” says Kering chief François-Henri Pinault. “He’s the one who convinced me to bring people from outside the economic sphere into the corporation, people from NGOs, specialists in transportation, energy, raw materials.”

Though he’s obsessive about Africa—Zeitz owns a 50,000-acre wildlife conservancy and ranch, Segera, in Kenya, where he spends three to four months a year—until a decade ago he had little interest in African art. He was a casual collector with a couple of Warhols and Lichtensteins and a few Peter Beards. Today’s African artists have never been more coveted abroad—the Fondation Louis Vuitton opened a big survey in Paris last spring, which was followed, a few weeks later, by Sotheby’s first Modern and Contemporary African Art sale in London. But for Zeitz the museum is less a reflection of a new fixation than the culmination of an ongoing love affair with the continent.

Zeitz was 26 on his first visit in 1989, a two-week tour of Kenya between marketing gigs at Colgate-Palmolive and Puma. “Africa fascinated me from a very young age,” he says. “I fell in love with the vibe, the people, the wildlife, everything.”

That trip inspired him to travel across the continent searching for a place of his own—it took him 14 years to find his retreat, teeming with big game, on Kenya’s Laikipia Plateau—and, eventually, to integrate Africa into Puma’s branding.

The company had fallen far from its heyday in the 1970s, when Pelé was Puma’s big star. Zeitz pioneered a new sports-lifestyle approach that introduced streetwear lines and collaborations with runway designers like Alexander McQueen and Jil Sander. “Jochen had a vision which I think a lot of people almost laughed at,” says Thore Ohlsson, the Swedish executive and member of Puma’s administrative board who championed Zeitz’s promotion from vice president of international sales and marketing. “We were a volume, low-end brand with lousy distribution, while this guy was saying we were going to become the coolest brand on the market.”

Coetze began to focus on emerging artists—buying up entire shows, investing in future output, commissioning more ambitious pieces. “We made a decision to make a commitment to young people, to the new generation, and not take the easy way out,” says Coetze. “It puts us in a very risky situation because it’s super easy to criticize, but I think it’s a much more exciting territory to play in.” He cast a wide net in bringing diaspora artists—broadly defined—into the collection, too, including well-established figures like British artists Chris Ofili and Isaac Julien.

African art entered the picture at Puma in 2007, 14 years into Zeitz’s tenure running the company, after his friend Peter Beard—in a characteristically provocative manner—dismissed, wholesale, the continent’s contemporary art. “We talked about art,” recalls Zeitz, of the exchange at Beard’s Hog Ranch in Kenya. “I said, ‘What about African artists?’ And he said, ‘There aren’t any.’ In his way he was always challenging you. I said, ‘I’m sure there are, and they ought to be more visible. I want to do something about it.’” (Beard, who suffered a stroke a few years ago, doesn’t recall details of the conversation but his wife, Nejma, says he “has always believed in African art.”)

Driven to prove that African artists deserved a place in the global spotlight, Zeitz brought in an art consultant to explore sponsorship opportunities at Puma. In 2008 he hired Coetze, a South African who had been running the Rubell Family Collection in Miami, to work full time as head of PUMAVision, a new arm focused on corporate responsibility. His mandate included offering broad support to the arts in Africa. On the side, Coetze became a private adviser to Zeitz, tasked with scouring the continent for significant work. “Mark wanted to do something in Africa,” recalls Zeitz. “I said, ‘Why don’t we join forces? We can build a collection, and then find a place where it belongs.’”

Eventually Heatherwick, who’d toured the silo for the first time while attending Cape Town’s Design Indaba conference in 2005, signed on to tackle the building—although he still wasn’t sure what it would house. “Our studio became a partner from an early stage,” he says. “We had a very open brief.”

The acquisitions were soon scattered among warehouses and Zeitz’s various homes in New Mexico, Switzerland, Kenya and Britain. When Zeitz left Puma after 22 years in 2012, Coetze followed him to focus on the collection full time. By then it had become significant enough for Zeitz to begin thinking of a permanent public home. They considered locations in Kenya, Nigeria, Mali and Ghana. “It had to be a metropolitan city,” says Zeitz. “We wanted a place that people from outside Africa came to but that was accessible to people from within, too.” They were close to a deal on a site in downtown Cape Town when Coetze got a call about the silo.

The building, on the Victoria & Alfred Waterfront—one of the most heavily trafficked tourist sites in Africa—had sat empty for more than two decades. Several reuse schemes had been floated over the years, including a parking garage, a mushroom farm and a Holiday Inn. By 2010 the area’s developers were exploring ideas for a world-class cultural institution—a “cathedral in the middle” of a new master-planned district, as Waterfront CEO David Green puts it. They reached out to architect Renzo Piano along with New York’s Guggenheim museum and the Tate in London, but all priced themselves out of contention. “We just didn’t have those sorts of funds,” says Green.

Eventually Heatherwick, who’d toured the silo for the first time while attending Cape Town’s Design Indaba conference in 2005, signed on to tackle the building—although he still wasn’t sure what it would house. “Our studio became a partner from an early stage,” he says. “We had a very open brief.”

Proposals for a design museum or an outpost for Charles Saatchi’s art collection had both fallen through when Coetze got a call in 2013 and went to visit. Zeitz later flew in to look at the building and Heatherwick’s plans for it. “It ticked all the boxes,” he says. “It took me 30 seconds to say, ‘That’s it.’” To get the museum started, Zeitz offered his collection for his lifetime (or a minimum of 20 years).

Heatherwick had devised a plan to fuse two adjacent structures, connecting them with a cavernous atrium. “This was a building that was just made of tubes; there’s never been space in it before,” he says.

“It needed a heart, something that would help you understand how to move around.” That heart, an engineering feat, follows the contours of a single digitally scanned kernel of corn, a nod to the building’s history as a grain silo. “We realized that curving surfaces interacting with a tubular structure did something beautiful,” says Heatherwick, “made unexpected lines and unexpected shapes.”

The architect, who is currently working on Google’s Silicon Valley headquarters with Danish architect Bjarke Ingels, calls the nearly $40 million transformation of the Cape Town structure “the most important launch my studio has ever had,” 23 years into its run. “We want people to be motivated that they have to come in,” he says, “and the best way to do that is to do something amazing beyond that threshold.”

In the four years since the museum was announced, several new projects devoted to contemporary African art have emerged around the world. Venture capitalist Jean Pigozzi, who built a massive collection of sub-Saharan art over the past 30 years (featured in the Fondation Vuitton’s survey), recently announced he’s scouting locations for his own museum in Europe. “I want to be like the visual ambassador of Africa,” Pigozzi says. “The Zeitz museum is a terrific thing, but why do a second museum in Africa? If Zeitz did it there, let’s do something completely different.” Another serious collector, Sindika Dokolo, plans to open an “art lab” and exhibition space in Portugal later this year, an annex to his new art compound in Angola. “My example, the example of Zeitz, hopefully will inspire other people in other African countries,” says

Dokolo, “so that we’ll start to have a solid, very sound African art market.”

Some critics have knives out awaiting the Zeitz museum’s opening in September and question Coetze’s bona fides as an arbiter of African art. “I don’t think he will be able to represent the entire continent,” says Ugochukwu-Smooth Nzewi, the new curator for African art at the Cleveland Museum of Art. “There’s no idealism around the museum. It’s driven by capital.” An institution directed and funded largely by white faces in postapartheid South Africa has also raised the issue of race and privilege. “We’ve been tackling tough questions,” acknowledges Coetze. “Who has the right to talk? Who represents whom? Who has the authority to talk on somebody else’s behalf?”

After the museum’s opening, Coetze plans to treat Heatherwick’s vast atrium as a blank canvas for monumental pieces—a sort of Southern Hemisphere version of the Tate Modern’s Turbine Hall. Fundraising efforts, including a charity auction organized by Christie’s in London last spring, have helped build enough of an endowment for Coetze to start buying up pieces owned outright by the museum, a permanent collection “held in trust in perpetuity for the people of Africa,” he says.

This is just the sort of legacy Zeitz had in mind when he started this project a decade ago. “It’s all part of a sort of puzzle in my head,” he says. “It’s not just about art, it’s about the messaging and people’s perceptions of Africa. In focusing on the 21st century, decades from now we’re automatically part of history.” •

Strokes of Genius

With her first American retrospective and more projects on the horizon, artist Nathalie Du Pasquier, an original founder of the Memphis Group, is finally getting her due.

BY CAROL KINO
PHOTOGRAPHY BY JAMES MOLLISON

THIS IS A TRAY from '84, done with a Danish carpenter," says 60-year-old artist Nathalie Du Pasquier, pointing out a dark wooden box inlaid with orange zigzags and arcs in her studio in Milan's Porta Nuova district. An Italian pottery plate, fired with a blue, yellow and red bull's-eye, is from "a series based on circles, done by me in Naples." Sheets of wallpaper are pinned to a wall like drawings, covered with rectangles that suggest cinder blocks or floral grids reminiscent of the British Arts and Crafts pioneer William Morris. The couch is piled with ziggurat-patterned blankets and pillows, some designed by Du Pasquier for the Danish design brand Hay, others in collaboration with her partner of 38 years, the British industrial designer George Sowden, for the Swiss company ZigZagZurich.

Du Pasquier's interest in textile design is unusual for a painter who, after working quietly for three decades, is poised for major art world attention. Following shows at Portugal's Kunsthalle Lissabon in January and Pace London this past summer, her first American retrospective, Big Objects Not Always Silent, just opened at Philadelphia's Institute of Contemporary Art, after a successful 2016 run at Austria's Kunsthalle Wien. For years, Du Pasquier has been celebrated as a founder of the Memphis Group, the collective that upended the design world when it launched in 1981, challenging every tenet of modernist black-and-chrome, form-must-follow-function good taste with its bright colors and asymmetrical lines. One of two female designers in the core Milan group, Du Pasquier created many of the exuberant patterns for which it became known. And today, with Memphis back in fashion, Du Pasquier is too—only now she's overturning contemporary art orthodoxies, with what Luca Lo Pinto, a curator at Kunsthalle Wien, calls "an expanded approach to painting."

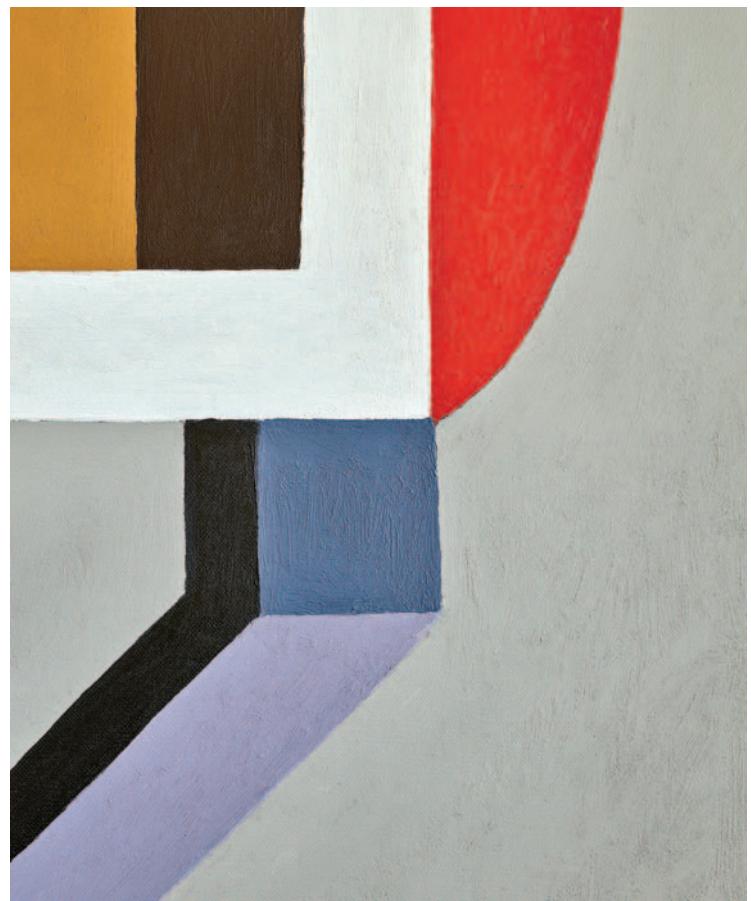

Seen on their own, Du Pasquier's paintings aren't so outrageous: Her early works include luminous oil-painted still lifes—glasses, cups, bricks, detergent bottles—that recall the Italian metaphysicist Giorgio Morandi. More recently, she has painted geometric constructions she builds from painted wood, as well as imagined abstractions. Lately she has shown them as sculptures that often fill entire rooms. Her recent shows have been grand installations, in which one might encounter a painting or vase balanced atop a cabinet or plinth, or paintings layered over wallpaper.

Her retrospective is a multigallery Gesamtkunstwerk that includes drawings; rugs; a room-size sculpture broadcasting a sound piece by a friend; and My Brain, a large chamber filled with paintings and objects that tell the story of her life. "It's kind of a city of Nathalie Du Pasquier," says Alex Klein, a curator at the ICA. "There's so much work, and it's exciting to see it singing in concert, to see the hierarchical categorizations dissolve between the design objects and the purely aesthetic objects."

"Nathalie has a lot of freedom to shift from one thing to another, without thinking too much about the consequences,” says Lo Pinto, who co-curated the Philadelphia show with Klein. “Sometimes you feel a bit disoriented, because you really don’t understand what you have in front of you.”

Also disorienting: Du Pasquier’s multiple projects. On September 29, Other Rooms opens at London’s Camden Arts Centre. It features rooms inside rooms, reams of drawings, painted paper shapes layered over wallpaper and seven ceramic vases named for days of the week—all of it new. “I think it’s a good time for her work,” says Jenni Lomax, who curated the show and recently stepped down as Camden’s director. “This collective way of working really chimes with the way artists are thinking. And it always makes you feel better when you see it, in the way that good design does.”

Du Pasquier’s ability to fearlessly blend art and design while embracing decoration has also won her a following. As Klein says, “A lot of younger artists are looking for models like Nathalie.”

“There is a bit of a cult around her,” says Tamara Corm, a Pace London director. When Corm told artists about Du Pasquier’s exhibition, comprising a site-specific installation and new sculptures and paintings, “they were all very excited,” she says. “Some knew her Memphis fabrics. It’s word of mouth. She’s cool.”

Raised in Bordeaux, France, where her mother was a historian of decorative arts and her father a virologist, Du Pasquier left after high school, traveling to West Africa, Australia, India and Rome, where she was an au pair for a year, before arriving in Italy’s design capital in 1979. “I didn’t know where to fit,” she says. She was always drawing but had no idea how to make that a career. “In France, if you don’t go through the academy or a course, you don’t get anywhere. I was sure I was never going to be doing anything.”

That changed when a chance meeting with an old acquaintance, the designer Martine Bedin, led her to the party where she met Sowden. Not only was it “love at first sight,” as Sowden says, but it was also creative kismet. Fifteen years her senior, he had been working for Ettore Sottsass, then Italian design’s reigning guru, and had just started his own firm, which was designing elements used in today’s personal computer. (Sottsass is now the subject of several hundred-birthday shows, including Ettore Sottsass: Design Radical at New York’s Met Breuer through October 8.) Sowden was also designing textiles, and one day Du Pasquier asked if she could try too. “I came home in the evening, she’d done like a hundred patterns,” Sowden recalls. “It was quite extraordinary—the energy, the sureness. It came from the wellspring of her creativity.” For Du Pasquier, making her first patterns was “like when you first fall in love,” she says. “It was incredible. I had discovered what I was going to be doing.”

For a year she collaborated with Sowden on various projects; then Memphis launched in critic Barbara Radice’s living room. Although others contributed during its six-year run, the core Milan group comprised Sottsass and seven of his much younger associates, including Sowden, Du Pasquier, Bedin and Radice, his wife-to-be.

Today Memphis is often described as a zany style involving wacky patterns and a jumble of angles and lines. But its founders reject that notion. “They keep thinking it’s jazzy—that we amuse ourselves,” says Radice. “No! It was an updating of the architectural alphabet.”

“There was no style,” says Sowden. “It wasn’t a planned aesthetic. It was a mess—a collage that created an extraordinary amount of positive energy, which just about everybody in the world picked up on. Everybody asked, ‘What’s going on?’ We asked that ourselves.”

As Sowden explains it, fashion and music had gone pop in the 1960s, but design and architecture were stuck in prewar formalism. “If it wasn’t black, it wasn’t design,” he says. “We were saying, Surely there’s something else.” In 1980, at the tail end of punk, “Sottsass told everybody that he had this opportunity to create this exhibition. It was kind of, Why don’t we just do what we want?” They met to look at each others’ drawings. “It was usually done in the evening, with a bottle of white wine,” Sowden says. Their furniture involved plenty of plastic laminate—then disdained by designers—because it was a great pattern vehicle. And they scrapped the idea of form following function and embraced design for its own sake—a move whose repercussions can be seen today.

Their first collection was unveiled in 1981, during Milan’s Salone del Mobile. People went wild: Karl Lagerfeld snapped up every piece, and the group became superstars. For Du Pasquier, it led to countless commissions, a designing stint with the fashion label Fiorucci and a crash course in manufacturing. She was the only one with no training or experience to rebel against, so for her it was all about discovery. “Everything seemed possible,” she says. “I designed jewels, dresses, textiles, carpets, furniture, cities, street furniture.” Just before Memphis disbanded in 1987, Du Pasquier says, “I felt a little bit trapped into the design Memphis girl. I preferred to explore something I didn’t know at all, so I started to paint.”

Inspired by postmodernism’s jumble of styles, Du Pasquier experimented with cityscapes and figuration before settling on the still life. For years she showed primarily with a Hong Kong dealer and did everything—making artists’ books, painting on walls at poetry slams, visiting artists’ retreats—until the art market crashed in 2008 and her modest sales dried up.

That’s when she was rediscovered by a younger generation, drawn by her connection to Memphis but also by her independence. The change began when Miu Miu used her Memphis prints, uncredited, in the spring 2006 collection. “They never paid anything,” Du Pasquier says. “But it turned out to my advantage. It put the things into fashion again just as everything collapsed.” (Miu Miu has declined to comment.)

New design projects arrived. Aided by the internet, so did new admirers, like Omar Sosa, co-founder and art director of the Barcelona-based interiors magazine Apartamento, who was entranced when he discovered Du Pasquier’s 2005 painting Bricks and Orange on a blog, realized her Memphis connection and put her in the magazine in 2011. Iris Alonzo, then creative director of American Apparel, says she found Du Pasquier’s paintings online and asked her to design a limited-edition clothing line, which came out in 2014, as did a line of tote bags for Wrong for Hay. “It’s crazy but somehow these things made me famous,” Du Pasquier says. “Then people went to my website and discovered that I am also a painter.”

Meanwhile, Sosa had finally persuaded Du Pasquier to make a book of her 1980s patterns—although he’d had to tread carefully. “Nathalie’s somebody that lives today in the present,” he says. “I didn’t want to push her too much to show me things that she did 30 years ago because I knew that for her that wasn’t relevant. But, of course, when I would see those illustrations, it was like, Wow!” Published in 2015—the first edition sold out and is now a collectors’ item—the book (Don’t Take These Drawings Seriously) fueled the fire. That’s how art insiders such as Corm and Lomax first learned of her paintings.

A decisive moment for Du Pasquier’s career came in 2014, when Lo Pinto became a curator at Kunsthalle Wien and soon after offered her a show. “I had an intuition,” says the curator, who’d discovered her work in a gallery and watched it for years. “She’s a person who’s not following any trends. She never wanted to be in a safe place. She always wants to look forward.”

Meanwhile, Du Pasquier’s art career is rocketing forward—the show at Pace London sold out—and the design projects haven’t stopped. Only now, instead of being a designer who paints, she’s increasingly seen as an artist who designs. Take the two silk scarves she created with Hermès. One reached stores last spring, and a second was just released. The house loved one of the designs so much that it used it for two dresses in the current women’s ready-to-wear line. Rather than asking Du Pasquier to create patterns, however, Hermès based the scarves on paintings. “Normally we work with illustrators,” says Christine Duvigneau, the label’s graphic design studio director, who has a Du Pasquier painting hanging in her office. “But Nathalie is an artist, so we bought a piece of art.”

That’s fine with Du Pasquier. For while she loves designing textiles, when she started painting 30 years ago, she says, “I understood that was the real adventure that I would go on until the day I die.” •

STILL LIFE

NOBUYOSHI ARAKI

The subversive photographer shares a few of his favorite things.

PHOTOGRAPHY BY NOBUYOSHI ARAKI

"THE CALLIGRAPHY on the left—written as kai raku en—means 'strange, bizarre or monstrous paradise' in Japanese. It's my original word and sounds like an existing word for pleasure (kai-raku), but it uses a different character that connotes strangeness. It's also the title for a publication of mine that will be released in 2018. I painted on the smaller girl doll, which was given to me as a gift—she's sitting on dead roses. The most beautiful moment in the life of a flower to me is when it's dying. So when I get flowers I leave them as they are for more than a week, without changing the water. It stinks a lot, but I like to take pictures of flowers in that moment. The Japanese doll to the right was also a gift. I cut her hair and made her untidy. I transformed the figure to her left, a gift, into an 'ogre of photography,' a self-portrait, by putting a camera on it and drawing on glasses. I've always enjoyed plastic dolls and dinosaurs. Everyone knows that now, so I get them as gifts a lot and then I paint them myself. I like to work on the dolls, same as the flowers—I find them more interesting that way. I've known the woman in the Polaroid, on the far left, since she was still an apprentice geisha in Kanazawa. When she became a geisha, she came to Tokyo and I took her picture to celebrate. The color palette is from when I visited the painter Yokonori Tadao's atelier to take his portrait. I believe that he always uses a paper plate as a palette. I found it very attractive, so I asked to have it. He signed it and gave it to me. The paper cutting next to it was done by one of my girlfriends, Komari, around 2005. She made it quite well. I spend more time at home now, and I take pictures of an altar I created in my house, with dolls, flowers and some other small things. I make a new composition every day with the materials around me. I keep a lot of things as souvenirs."
